Thou camest forth, the Aeons being gathered; thou camest forth, they being gathered unto thee.
Tell the news.
Awake, ye that slumber and sleep in the . . . ., that you may be told the news.
Lo, the news-bearer has been sent with the news of the Land of Light to tell us the news of the skies.
He was sent, he came hurrying and rejoicing to the First Man, that [he] might tell him the news.
He came and knocked at the gates (πύλη) and cried, 'Open quickly that I may tell you the news of [the skies].
'Rise up, o First Man, open thy gates (πύλη) that are shut that I may tell thee the news.
'Rise up, o First Man, arouse thy beloved ones, that I may tell thee the news.
'Rise up, o First Man, sound, o trumpet (σάλπιγξ) of peace (εἰρήνη), that I may tell thee the news.

'The walls that I left firmly established, the watch-tower men that guard them. Tell the news.
'What does the Mother of the Living do, whom I left, and her brethren also? Tell the news.'
The First Man rejoices asking: he said to him,
'Tell the news.'
And the Call answered again: 'I came forth, they being gathered,
I came forth, the Gods rejoicing. Lo, this is the news of the skies.
'I came forth, they being gathered; I came forth, they being gathered unto me. Lo, this is the news.
'I came forth, the Father being gathered; the Aeons being gathered unto the Father. Lo, this is the news.
'I came forth, the Aeons being gathered, being a garland about the Father. Lo.
'I was sent, the Father rejoicing, he being in the bride-chamber (νυμφών) of the Land of Light, that I might tell the news.

'They smelt the breath of the air (ἀήρ), it was death to them [all.
Take up the news.
'Let us go, they await thee: the Light has surrounded the Darkness.
'Let us go, they await thee, they are on the border (?), they expect thee.
'Lo, God has wholly come: do thou call, he will answer thee.
'Lo, they that shall help thee await thee, their hands are spread to embrace thee. Take the news.
'They are laden with garlands and palms to give to thee, the victorious captain.' Take the news.
The envoy (πρεσβευτής) heard the good news, he took it to him that sent him. Take the news.
The Fathers of Light came that they might help their loved one. Take the news.
They helped the First Man, he cried before him in joy: 'Behold me, behold my merchandise.' Lo.
Great is the joy that there was, the First Man being in their midst, laden with garlands and palms. Lo, this is the news.
May it happen to us together that we may be counted in his merchandise and rejoice with all the Aeons. Lo, this is the news.
May we be counted among those of the right hand and inherit (κληρονομεῖν) our kingdom. Lo, this is the news.
And may we live with our kinsmen from everlasting to everlasting.
Lo, this is the news.
Glory to the First Man, honour to the Living Spirit, and their busy deeds which they have done. Victory to the soul of the blessed (μακαρία) Mary, Theona.

The] Psalms (ψαλμός) of Thomas: I: Concerning the Father and] all his Aeons and the Stirring of the Enemy.

My Father, the] glad Light, the glad Light, the Glorious, my Father, the glad Light, the glad and blessed Light, my Father, the glad Light, the glad and honoured Light: he evoked the Aeons of Light, he appointed them to the joy of his greatness. He evoked the Aeons of Peace (εἰρήνη), in whom there is no waning or diminution. He evoked the Aeons of Light, he summoned his sons and set them up in them. He evoked the Aeons of Peace (εἰρήνη), he summoned his Richnesses and set them up in them.
He evoked the Aeons of Rest, he summoned his Angels and set them up in them. He established dwellings (ταμιεῖον) of Life and set up living Images (εἰκών) in them, he set up living Images (εἰκών) in them which never perish. He evoked clouds of Brightness, dropping down dew (?) and life, he summoned a holy fire, giving a sweet burning.
He evoked a Wind and an Air (ἀήρ), breathing the breath of the Living. He evoked holy Mountains, sending up fragrant roots. They are all in agreement and concord: there is no waning or diminution in them, they rejoicing and being glad in the glory (?), full, abiding in Eternity. I know not where the Son of Evil saw them: he rose up saying, May I be one like them. [Where] did the Son of Evil see them? He rose up saying, May I be one like them. Where did the Son of Evil see them — the poor one who has nothing, no riches in his treasure (χρῆμα), no Eternity in his possession (κτῆσις), no riches in his treasure (χρῆμα)? He rose up saying, May I be one like them. He caught the hand of his hand (?)], thinking (σκέπτεσθαι) to make war, he seized their cruel armour, that had been provided to make a war (πόλεμος), he broke their snares that were set, he burst also their nets that were spread, he let the fish out to their sea (θάλασσα), he let the birds fly in the air (ἀήρ), he let the birds fly out in the air (ἀήρ), he let the sheep into their fold (?), he rolled up his wealth, he took it, he took it up to the Land (χώρα) of Rest. That which the Living ones took [therefore] was saved: they will return again to that which is theirs.

Concerning the coming of the Soul

They] that are not as I am made themselves like me, they that are unworthy of me made me wroth. The wretches (?) that belong not to the house of my Father rose, they took arms against me, they rose, they took arms against me, making war (πόλεμος) with me, making war (πόλεμος) with me, fighting (?) for my holy robe, for my enlightening Light, that it might lighten their Darkness, for my sweet Fragrance, that it might sweeten (μυρίζειν) their foulness, because of my brethren, the Sons of Light, that they might give a peace (εἰρήνη) to their land (χώρα), because of my sister, the hour of Light, that she might be a strengthening of their building. A part (? μέρος) therefore went forth from my robe, it went, it lightened their Darkness; my sweet fragrance went, it sweetened (μυρίζειν) their stink;
my brethren, the Sons of Light, went, they gave a peace (εἰρήνη) to their land (χώρα); my sister went, the hour of Light, she was a strengthening of their building. They take arms against me, making war (πόλεμος) with me, crying out against me, like men going to subdue a camp (παρεμβολή);
they drew the swords against me, like men going to kill lions; they stretched their hands to the bow against me, like thieves going to attack a man.

They did not stir from warring with me until [they had made a wall against me: the weak and paralysed ones continually crept, they did not stir until they had made a wall against me, they crept until they had made a wall against me: they established a watch outside me . . .
the bell was made to go round because of me, my good fortune (?) [came on my behalf, the wretches thinking in their heart that I [was] a man for whom none would seek. I therefore was looking towards my Father, that he might send aid (βοήθεια), looking towards my brethren, the sons of Light, that they might come, tracking me. My Father therefore sent the aid (βοήθεια) to me, my brethren arose, they became one with [me.
Through a cry only which my brethren uttered, their wall tottered and fell, their wall tottered and fell, their watches were unable to (?) stop (κωλύειν) them, nor (οὔτε) was he that goes round with the bell and cries good fortune (?) found, against the cry which my brethren uttered. The demons ran to the Darkness, the demons ran to the Darkness, trembling seized their Archon entirely. But (δέ)
I said to my brethren, 'Suffer (ἄνεχε) me yet this hour'. I was quieting my brethren that they might not destroy their firmament (στερέωμα); for I await my robe until it comes and clothes him that shall wear (φορεῖν) it. I will await my enlightening Light until it strips itself of their Darkness. I will await my pleasant fragrance until it returns to its place. I will await my sister, the hour of Light, until she casts their corruption away. I will await my brethren, the sons of Light, until their stature (?) is completed for them. When therefore my shining robe comes and clothes him that shall wear (φορεῖν) it: when my pleasant fragrance strips itself of their stink and returns and scattered to their worlds (κόσμος), they took [roots and the Mighty one that a . . . . . had overtaken his ship and its helmsmen were wounded and they that were entrusted with the treasure (χρῆμα) were endangered (κινδυνεύειν). He called an envoy (πρεσβευτής), a storehouse (ταμιεῖον) of life, which is the Mind (νοῦς), he called an envoy (πρεσβευτής) and sent him forth unto the ship, [saying], Go to the place hither the wind has taken the ship; tow the ship and bring it up hither; tend (θεραπεύειν) its helmsmen; set up them that were entrusted with the treasure (χρῆμα); dig up their land with the spade

11 βλάττα: I cannot understand from the context what this word means here: vid. Thes. Ling. Lat. s. v. — 15. 17 etc. ⲱⲛⲁ: the meaning here is evidently 'lair', 'cave', 'den', of lion or wild beast, and the word seems to be used figuratively in this sense at 15, 3, and perhaps Hom. 89, 22. At 15, 18 and 188, 18 ⲱⲛⲁ means 'chaff'.

l. 30 illegible

4 τελώνης (used literally, 192, 19) here and at 97, 10 denotes the heavenly officer who examines the soul and its merchandise when it has finished its voyage. — 6 (a) ⲕⲁⲕⲏⲛ ⲕⲁⲕⲱⲥ: the Gk. was presumably something like συλήσουσιν αὐτὴν (sc. τὴν νῆα) κακὴν κακῶς. I think that we have here a form of the later κακινκακῶς (vid. Byzant. Zeitsch. iii 152 ff.; viii 157 f.); (b) μεταγγισμός: vid. J.A.O.S. 1925, pp. 246 ff.

Therefore am I troubled for my soul, lest it faint and

PHILOSOPHICAL BACKGROUND OF THE COSMOLOGICAL POLEMICS IN CONTRA MANICHAEOS BY JOHN OF DAMASCUS

ABSTRACT. This article analyzes the philosophical arguments used by John of Damascus against the Manichaean dualist cosmological system in his Dialogue contra Manichaeos, showing some parallels with his Dialectica, and revealing a common Aristotelian background. The philosophical argument in the Dialogue seems to be a practical application of philosophical doctrines formulated in the Dialectica. From a wider perspective of anti-Manichean polemics used in part for instructional purposes for students of philosophy and theology in Late Antiquity, the conclusion is made that the purpose of the Dialogue was aimed not so much against the Manichaean cosmogony and cosmology, but against the Manichaean theodicy which might have been attractive to some Christians of John's times.

KEYWORDS: John of Damascus, Manichaeism, Aristotle, syllogistic proof, substance, contraries, Neoplatonic education.

At the time of social and political changes in Syria and Palestine in the eighth century,[1] a clear and simple solution to the problem of evil, offered by Manichaean dualism[2] must have appealed to many Muslims and Christians,[3] thus triggering the appearance of both Muslim and Christian anti-Manichaean polemics.[4] The problem of evil was resolved in Manichaeism by relegating all good attributes to one divine, beneficial principle of light, and all bad attributes to the other evil, dark, and malevolent principle of matter. In its scope, the Dialogue contra Manichaeos of John of Damascus consists of two parts. In the first part John of Damascus refutes the Manichaean cosmologic myth on the basis of Aristotelian syllogisms. Then the "Manichean" interlocutor almost disappears from the scene and the second part of the Dialogue discusses the problems associated with the presence of evil in the world which was created by a benevolent God, His foreknowledge, and divine providence, masterfully rethinking the solutions offered in the Homily That God Is Not the Author of Evil by Basil of Caesarea.[5] This article will examine more closely the first part of the Dialogue and consider several counterarguments of John of Damascus against some provisions of the Manichaean dualist system.

In the beginning of the Dialogue, John of Damascus presents the Manichaean cosmogonic myth: there were two primordial principles, good and evil, each one in its own place, "and the good one is called the Good Tree, containing and producing every good, incapable of bringing evil fruit, and the evil one – darkness, decay, the Evil Tree, containing all bad and evil things, incapable of bringing good fruit…"[6] This evil or matter was lifeless, motionless, ugly and dark, and then it rebelled against itself, and its fruits fought with each other. When some of them fled and others pursued, they reached the boundaries of the realm of light. Seeing the light, they desired its beauty, stopped fighting with each other, made a mutual agreement, and attacked the light. And the Good One sent power from himself, and in the battle, the Good One allowed a particle of light to be taken away from him and devoured by the rulers of darkness in order to overcome evil by means of the particle that he gave away. This resulted in a mixture of good and evil in the world: souls emerged from the particle of goodness, and bodies emerged from the substance of evil (οὐσίας τῆς κακίας).[7]

[3] S. Stroumsa and G. Stroumsa suggested that Manichaean dualism might have fostered the discussions on free will in early Islam and ultimately resulted in shaping some basic Muslim doctrines of theodicy (Stroumsa, Stroumsa 1988, 52-54); see also Reeves 2011; Baran Tekin 2017, 1-9; Griffith 2011, and Griffith 1987, 94-96, 99-102.

Kotter says in the introduction to the text that no detectable earlier source texts can be identified (Kotter 1981, 344), a number of textual and conceptual parallels make it possible to identify Basil's Homily as a primary source for John of Damascus theodicy and doctrine of divine foreknowledge in the Dialogue (Baranov 2019).

This basic myth appears in many variations;[8] in terms of verbal formulations, the closest version to the one presented by John of Damascus can be found in Theodoret of Cyrus' Haereticarum fabularum compendium, including the metaphorical description of the primordial good principle as a good tree, with good fruit, and matter as a bad tree bearing bad fruit, as well as the mixed current state of the world.[9] Manichaeism originated in the Persian-Babylonian Judeo-Christian environment with its specific metaphorical and poetic frame of mind,[10] and did not attempt to formulate its cosmogony and cosmology in structurally arranged ontological terms associated with causality, as was the case with the Greek philosophical tradition. The evil in this system was not a strictly moral or ontological category but should rather be viewed as a personification and antithesis of anything morally or esthetically good and beautiful.[11]

Triggered by the drama of evil in this world and projecting this perception onto the level of cosmic drama of the particles of light entrapped and imprisoned in matter, the Manichaean dualism never succeeded in articulating this opposition on a strictly rational and philosophical level or in formulating a coherent terminological and conceptual system supporting it.[12] When Manichean missionaries entered the Greek-speaking world, they were forced to translate their myth and its constituent elements not only into the Greek language but also into the Greek frame of mind, and use such concepts as principles (ἀρχαί), matter (ὕλη), substance (οὐσία), and nature (φύσις),[13] all of which had enormously rich philosophical meaning, thus causing perplexity in philosophers and becoming susceptible to criticism on philosophical grounds. A "Christianized" version of the Manichaean myth[14] is described by Theodore Abū Qurrah, the Bishop of Harran (ca. 750–ca.

825), who started his ecclesiastical career just a generation after John of Damascus, and described his encounter with the Manichees. These Manichees claimed to be true Christians possessing the true Gospel; they described their primordial principles as substances, and associated the evil principle with Satan.

> The true Gospel is in our possession: it is the one which the twelve apostles have written. There is no Church except for the one which we have, and no one is (truly) Christian except for us. No one discerns the (proper) interpretation of the Gospel apart from Mānī, our founder. Thus has he taught us: Before this world was created, there were two gods whose substances were each different. One of them was Light, Good—it is the good deity—and the other was Evil, Darkness; namely, Satan.[15] In the beginning, each one of them occupied its own territory. Then Darkness noticed the Radiant One and its beauty and its excellence.[16] Filled with desire for it, it pounced upon it and fought with it, wishing to capture it. The Radiant One strove to combat it, but Darkness was on the verge of gaining victory over it. As the Radiant One was in mortal fear, it lopped off a piece of itself and flung it to it, and Darkness swallowed it. Heaven and earth and everything between them were created from the nature of Darkness and from the nature of the piece that the Radiant One threw to him: they came into being by means of (their) combination. For example, humans are created having an internal soul and an external body. They claim that the soul derives from the nature of the Radiant One and the body derives from the nature of Satan, the Dark One.[17]

[15] The discrepancy between the goodness of the original creation and the observable reality is closely related to the figure of the devil as the main actor and instigator of evil-doing. However, in order to remove even the slightest possibility that the devil somehow embodied absolute evil, John of Damascus argued that even the devil was not completely evil since he still participated in being which was a goodness originating from the good God, and possessed free will as a rational creature (Dialogus contra Manichaeos, 32-36, ed. Kotter 1981, 372-373).

[16] This version of the myth notably omits a very important Manichaean notion of "the disorderly movement" (ἄτακτος κίνησις) within the evil principle before its battle with the principle of light. Cf. John of Damascus, Dialogus contra Manichaeos, 61: "There was, as you say, matter without beginning, unoriginate, in its own borders, eternally disorderly moving (ἀεὶ ἀτάκτως κινουμένη)" (ed. Kotter, 380.1-2). After citing the myth, Theodore Abū Qurrah added an important remark concerning the "intuitive" distribution of empirical phenomena in accordance with the two principles among his Manichees:

> So too for the condition of all things: whatever in them that is good and pleasant is from the nature of the Radiant One, and whatever is not good and harmful is from the nature of the Dark One. For example, water drowns the one who is submerged in it but invigorates and pleases the one who drinks it. The part (of water) that invigorates is from the Radiant One, while that which drowns and ruins is from Darkness. As for serpents, scorpions, lions, leopards, crawling creatures, and their sort, all these are from Darkness.[18]

Similarly, the Early Neoplatonic philosopher Alexander of Lycopolis who encountered one of the first Manichaean missionaries disguised as students in his school five hundred years before Theodore, thus described his indignation at their methods of reasoning, combining attempts at philosophizing with "poetical fables":

> The reason I say this is that I know for a fact that people of this sort [that is, the Manicheans], whenever deficient in proofs, bring together from all sides certain matters derived from poetry to use them as a defence of their private doctrines. However, they would not have done so if they had ever consulted any author you would like to suggest with any amount of care.[19]

Yet, the greatest stumbling stone of the Manichaean cosmology was not even in the existence of the two opposing primordial principles of the universe, but in the mixed state resulting from the attraction of the dark principle to the light and the ensuing cosmic battle, which implied that these principles were not completely alien to each other but had some common grounds.[20]

Before presenting and refuting the Manichaean myth, John of Damascus starts his Dialogue with an argument about the scope of logical reasoning:

> Orthodox: Since we came together to make a logical inquiry between ourselves, I will ask you: what is our goal? Manichaean: To compete in inquiring about faith in order to find the truth. O: But what is truth? M.: Establishing and acknowledging that which exists. O.: Is falsehood opposite to truth? M.: In every respect. O.: Why do you say so?

> M.: Because truth is knowledge of existing beings, and falsehood is [knowledge] of that which is non-existing. O.: You answered incorrectly that truth is the knowledge of existing beings, and falsehood is knowledge of that which is non-existing, since something non-existent cannot be known. M.: What then is falsehood? O.: Ignorance of the existing beings. M.: Right. O.: So, if truth is knowledge of existing beings, and falsehood is ignorance of existing beings, then tell me: is knowledge a possession? M.: Yes. O.: If knowledge is a possession, then ignorance, of course, is privation. M.: Ignorance is also possession. O.: What is ignorance? M.: Not possessing knowledge. O.: Does the particle "not" indicate privation or presence and possession? M.: "Not" shows privation. O.: Do we call non-existing that which is deprived of existence? M.: Sure. O.: So, if ignorance is the lack of knowledge, and "not" indicates privation, ignorance is therefore privation, not possession. M.: Right. O.: Therefore, if truth is knowledge, it is clear that it is possession, and if falsehood is ignorance, according to true reasoning, it is privation. So, it turns out that truth is possession, and falsehood is privation; and truth is an existing thing, while falsehood is a non-existing thing. M.: Certainly. O.: Is evil true or false? M.: False. O.: So, evil is non-existent, but is privation of being and non-existent, and opposite to goodness as privation of possession.[21]

At first sight this seems to be a "sophist" argument about words, aimed at getting an upper hand in the conversation with a gullible Manichaean and demonstrating his philosophical incapacity. In fact, this is an introduction to the main point of polemics against the Manichaean concept of two independent ontological principles: denial of substantial status to the evil principle and considering it as an accident in the substance of all existing beings. Moreover, the Dialectica makes it clear that philosophy for John of Damascus was not the "handmaid of theology": by combining school definitions of philosophy as knowledge of beings, imitation of God, and moral doctrine, he defined it as the fundamental path to true knowledge of God since philosophy as "the love of wisdom" is the love of God.[22] His anti-Manichaean arguments can be best seen if we consider parallel-

Now, we become like God in wisdom, which is to say, in the true knowledge of good; and in justice, which is a fairness in judgment without respect to persons; and in holiness, which is to say, in goodness, which is superior to justice, being that by which we do good to them that wrong us. Philosophy is the art of arts and the science of sciences. This is because philosophy is the principle of every art, since through it every art and science has been invented. Now, according to some, art is what errs in some people and science what errs in no one, whereas philosophy alone does not err. According to others, art is ism between the philosophical arguments in the Dialogue as practical applications of the conceptual framework presented in the Dialectica.[23]

The Dialectica has survived in a short version of fifty chapters and extensive revision (67 or 68 chapters), both belonging to John of Damascus and was first mentioned in a polemical treatise of the Miaphysite Patriarch Elias (706–728).[24] The first layer of the text containing the concepts adopted from the Eisagoge of Porphury can be dated to the late seventh–early eighth century. Later John of Damascus included several sources going back to the Categories of Aristotle. The Dialectica continues the tradition of Christian textbooks of logic which drew on the commentaries on Aristotle written in Alexandria in the fifth and sixth centuries. Christian collections would replace the names in the examples, such as Socrates and Plato, by names such as Peter and Paul, and focus not on elaborating the thought of Aristotle but on the concepts important for defending the Christian faith using logic-based polemics.[25] However, even though Byzantine logic was clearly Aristotelian in its foundations, the interpretation of Aristotle was influenced by Neoplatonic exegesis and the Christian patristic tradition of logic.[26]

In the introductory chapters of the Dialectica, John presents his concept of knowledge and its scope in very similar terms as it appears in the introductory dialogue with the Manichaean cited above. According to Damascene, knowledge can only be of things which exist, while falsehood is privation and ignorance:

> Nothing is more estimable than knowledge, for knowledge is the light of the rational soul. The opposite, which is ignorance, is darkness. Just as the absence of light is darkness, so is the absence of knowledge a darkness of the reason… By knowledge I mean the true knowledge of things which are, because things which have being are the object of knowledge. False knowledge, in so far as it is a knowledge of that which is not, is ignorance rather than knowledge. For falsehood is nothing else but that which is not. Now, since we do not live with our soul stripped bare, but, on the conthat which is done with the hands, whereas science is any art that is practiced by the reason, such as grammar, rhetoric, and the like. Philosophy, again, is a love of wisdom. But, true wisdom is God. Therefore, the love of God, this is the true philosophy" (ed. Kotter, 1969, 56.1-27; transl. Chase 1958, 11). These are the standard definitions of philosophy taught to the students of the Neoplatonic philosophical schools of Athens and Alexandria in the fifth and sixth centuries (Ierodiakonou, O'Meara 2008, 712).

Only things which exist or possess being can be defined, analyzed, known, comprehended, and properly spoken about. In his polemics with the Manichaean doctrine, John of Damascus proposed to make generalizations of empirical reality not according to "horizontal" beneficial or malevolent principles, but according to the vertical hierarchy of individuals, species, and genera, culminating in substance as a universal attribute of everything including God.

All existing things are united by their most general commonness of existence or substance. In the Dialectica, John of Damascus mentioned the distinction between substance as the universal commonness of beings, and nature as the genus referring to the "pagan philosophers," qualifying that the Fathers used "substance" and "nature" in the same sense.[28] However, he actively employed the "pagan" notion of substance as the most universal commonness of all beings in his Dialogue, adopting the anti-Manichaean philosophical argument used already by Titus of Bostra, that substances cannot be contrary to each other, and good and evil are not substances but qualities existing in a substance as the sole principle and commonality of all beings, based on Aristotle's Categories:[29]

> O: …And how do you say that the two principles which you have invented have nothing in common? For if both exist, and one substance is an unoriginate and eternal [28] "In this same way the pagan philosophers stated the difference between οὐσία, or substance, and φύσις, or nature, by saying that substance was being in the strict sense, whereas nature was substance which had been made specific by essential differences so as to have, in addition to being in the strict sense, being in such a way, whether rational or irrational, mortal or immortal. In other words, we may say that, according to them, nature is that unchangeable and immutable principle and cause and virtue which has been implanted by the Creator in each species for its activity <…> The holy Fathers paid no attention to the many inane controversies, and that which is common to and affirmed of several things, that is to say, the most specific species, they called substance, and nature, and form – as, for example, angel, man, horse, dog, and the like" (ed. Kotter 1969, 93-94, transl. Chase 1958, 55-56).

[29] "It seems most distinctive of substance that what is numerically one and the same is able to receive contraries" (Categories, 5, 4a10-12, transl. Ackrill, 1963, 11).

principle, and the other one is the same, then they are not completely devoid of commonness. For they have a commonality according to being and substance, and because [each one] is an unoriginate and eternal principle.[30]

O.: In terms of existence, is being opposite to being or to non-being?
M.: The existing evil is opposite to the existing good.
O: I did not ask if they are opposite in terms of good and evil, but in terms of existence. For things which exist are not completely opposite, since they have commonness with each other by their very being, while non-being is opposite to being. Thus, if evil is completely opposite to good, then evil does not exist. Therefore evil is privation of being and is called evil, and if good is substance, then evil is devoid of substance, otherwise they cannot be completely opposite.[31]

This argument is the syllogistic expression of the definition of substance encompassing all beings including God from the Dialectica, and is based on Aristotle's statements from the Categories that contraries are predicated of a substance;[32] that contrary is not a substance and that substance has nothing contrary to it.[33] As a Christian theologian, at this crucial point of his argument on the common existence of God and created beings, John of Damascus is also forced to make a reservation that although God is substance, He exists in a special "supra-substantial manner:

Cf. pseudo-Didymus, Syllogisms against the Manichees, I. 1.: "No absolute opposition exists between contraries, since the contraries have certain common attributes. White, for example, which is contrary to black, is opposed to the latter in respect of differentiae alone, while colour and quality are common to them. But nothing of this sort [i.e. like white and black] has its opposition in this respect at a prior [i.e. more general] level; for they are all logically posterior to the common attributes and among the common attributes there is no opposition. There must be colour and quality in common if white and black are to exist; in the same way, virtue and vice are logically posterior to quality and disposition. Thus, if there are two unoriginate first principles [i.e good and evil] and these are contraries, then either their opposition is absolute or they have some common attributes. Nothing, however, is regarded as a contrary in an absolute sense; therefore they have common features, such as existence and being substances and whatever else is found to be common to them. The fact that one is good while the other is evil and that one is light while the other is darkness makes them contraries. The fact that they are substances is conceived of as prior to their being good and evil. Their opposition therefore lies not in what they have in common, but rather in what is peculiar to each" (Bennett 1997, 284/302 Greek/translation).

> Being is the common name for all things which are. It is divided into substance and accident. Substance is the principal of these two, because it has existence in itself and not in another. Accident, on the other hand, is that which cannot exist in itself but is found in the substance. For the substance is a subject, just as matter is of the things made out of it, whereas an accident is that which is found in the substance as in a subject… Substance is defined as follows: Substance is a thing which exists in itself and has no need of another for its existence. Accident, however, is that which cannot exist in itself, but has its existence in another. God, then, is substance, and so is every created thing. God, however, even though He is substance, is super-substantial.[34]

In addition to substance as a universal commonness of beings, John of Damascus turns to the notion of principle (ἀρχή) treating it in the traditional Aristotelian meaning of causality, as opposed to the secondary meaning of causality among the Manichees, who primarily understood ἀρχή as a "notional compartment" for arranging empirical good or bad phenomena. Aristotle stated that ἀρχαί should be understood as causes, and they all are united by the starting-point, whether internal or external, of being, becoming, or knowledge. In the two consecutive chapters in his discussion of the single ἀρχή as opposed to the Manichaean multiple ἀρχαί, John of Damascus applied what seems to be a variant of the third man argument, disrupting the endless chain of givers of being only by the beginningless first giver, and using inductive reasoning:

> M.: Why is God unoriginate?
> O.: Because that which is non-existent, does not have being from itself. And how that which has no being from itself, will exist from itself? By necessity that non-being has to receive being from something existing, and the first sharer of being, who has being from himself, will always be unoriginate.[35]
> M.: Why is there one beginning and not two?
> O.: Because dyad proceeds from monad as the offspring of the monad, and monad is the beginning of dyad, and monad is clearly prior to dyad, and since every thing has one beginning, and if each of beings has one beginning, all things will have one beginning, for the judgment applicable to each of beings will apply to all.[36]

In his further refutation of the doctrine of two primordial principles, John dwells on the classification of sources of beginning (ἀρχαί) or causes proposed by Aristotle in the Metaphysics, who formulated various meanings of ἀρχή as the starting-point of movement or endeavor, part of the thing from which its genesis begins (such as the foundation of a house), the external starting-point of genesis or movement (efficient cause, including natural causation such as a child from its father and mother), that which moves something else at its will (such as city powers and dignitaries as well as creative causation in producing art), and that from which knowledge of a thing starts (such as epistemological premises of proofs).[37]

John of Damascus distinguished between ἀρχή in terms of time, place, dignity and power, preceding sequence of numbers, order, and causality which was triple and included a natural cause, creative cause, and imitative cause.[38] John of Damascus argued that in neither of these kinds one could find two unoriginate yet opposing ἀρχαί. In terms of time, any changing principle, either from the bodiless state into a body, or from the invisible state into some form, or from quietude to turmoil (which were the stages of the Manichaean myth) would become something new which it had not been before and thus could not be unoriginate.[39] In terms of space, the opposites could not be located within each other because this would lead to their mutual destruction, but each one had to occupy its own limited space separated by a boundary to avoid interpenetration. Thus there would be light and its space, darkness and its space, and the boundary, which would altogether give five primordial principles instead of two.[40] Both power and dignity were relational, implying power and dignity over something, which in the case of the two principles would mean either that one would rule over the other, or that both would not rule over anything, or there would be some other subordinate principle over which two principles would exercise their power, which would multiply the number of the primordial principles if they were coeternal with the two, or annihilate the power of the two if the subordinate principles were not co-eternal and there was a state when they did not yet exist.[41] Two principles could also not be conceived from the viewpoint of natural causality: if they were the originators of beings as natural causes, everything would be coeternal and consubstantial to these principles, and therefore unchangeable.[42] If the two principles were considered from the viewpoint of creative causality, both souls and bodies would not emanate from these principles but would come into being from non-being, and matter would not fight with light and would not capture its particle to produce souls. Moreover, John argued that it was inconceivable that two opposite principles could come together in agreement for creating a single world and single man.

In addition to Aristotelian works, another important genre of literature which was likely used in the Dialogue by John of Damascus was anti-Manichaean writings composed not for strictly polemical purposes, but for instructional purposes of Neoplatonic education, logically evolving from the inner Platonist strain between the monist and dualist principles imbedded into Plato's cosmogony and cosmology.[43]

Although Plato described the Receptacle in Timaeus 30A and 52E-53A as a source of disorderly motion, it was only used as a notion for explaining diversity in the world, some of which might result in the options which we might perceive as evil. In Plato's successor Speusippus, two primary principles were the One possessing utmost simplicity and Multiplicity facilitating division and associated with fluid matter. These principles were not in opposition to each other; Multiplicity simply assisted the One in fostering diversity and individuation of the cosmos. Xenocrates placed the sublunar region under the rule of a "lower Zeus" who can be identified with Hades and may be in some way associated with the deity mentioned by Plutarch as Pluto/Hades who also ruled the sublunar realm, regulated changeableness in the world, and was contrasted, although not strictly opposed to, with a transcendent deity identified with Apollo. Antiochus of Ascalon in the first century B.C. proposed an active principle and passive principle of matter as formless substance devoid of any quality. Eudorus of Alexandria also followed the monist line of thought proposing a supreme One above the pair of Monad and Indefinite Dyad, warranting all existence including matter.

However, in the late first century A.D. another, dualist tendency started to prevail in Platonist discussions. Thus, in addition to a subordinate, sublunar deity, Plutarch introduced a much more radically evil power in the universe, whose strife represented the tension of opposites, preserving the world's existence. The Indefinite Dyad acted as the evil principle; Unlimitedness was the principle of formlessness and disorder, yet the One limited and contained the void, irrational, and indeterminate in Unlimitedness. In the second century A.D., Numenius of Apamea propagated a dualistic system, equating Matter with the Indefinite Dyad and Maleficent Soul of Plutarch, and considering Matter to be fluid and devoid of quality, yet clearly evil. Plotinus inherited this distinctly dualist tendency of Platonism in his discussion of matter and evil,[44] at the time when Manichaeism started to enter the Roman Empire.

For the later Neoplatonism, Manichaeism became a "punching bag" both in the process of articulating the "normative" Platonic teaching[45] and in instructing students in logic by exposing the logical flaws in the basic Manichaean doctrines or Manichaean paralogisms, after incorporating Aristotelian logical treatises and his methodology of syllogistic proofs into the curriculum.[46] The course of studying the works of Aristotle, before studying Plato's dialogues, acquired a standardized and organized shape in the mid fifth century by the time of Proclus, who thus justified the use of studying paralogisms in the prologue to his commentary on Euclid's Elements, which was also a part of the curriculum: "Since there are many matters that seem to be dependent on truth and to follow from scientific principles but really lead away from them and deceive the more superficial students, he [Euclid] has given us methods for clear-sighted detection of such errors; and if we are in possession of these methods, we can train beginners in this science for the discovery of paralogisms and also protect ourselves from being led astray."[47] Manichaean arguments became particularly actively discussed in the sixth century by such thinkers as Simplicius, John Philoponus, Zacharias Scholasticus, Severus of Antioch, John the Grammarian, and Paul the Persian, some of whom studied philosophy in Alexandria from Ammonius, the Neoplatonist philosopher and student of Proclus, and who later taught and practiced grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy.[48]

A good example of the intersecting traditions of the Late Antique Neoplatonic and Christian education, and borrowing of the Neoplatonic curriculum by the Christians is the early sixth century First Homily against the Manichaeans by John the Grammarian, which in fact is not a homily but lecture notes by a Christian teacher of Neoplatonic philosophy on several problems related to matter and light resulting from the Manichaean worldview, and their solutions using Neoplatonic philosophical methods.[49] The structure of the Homily strongly resembles the part of the Dialogue by John of Damascus which refuted the propositions of the Manichaean cosmology. Both treatises start with a brief epistemological introduction, present the problem in the form of a proposition (matter is living and ungenerated) in John the Grammarian and the Manichaean cosmogonic myth in John of Damascus, and go on to refute it by syllogistic argumentation based on Aristotelian premises.

Because of largely common methods of advanced education among pagans and Christians, the same arguments, albeit sometimes appearing in differing wording and supplied by different examples, resurface in a number of various treatises, both pagan and Christian. Thus, the argument on the commonality of contraries in substance appears in John of Damascus, John the Grammarian's treatise, in a collection of syllogisms attributed to Didymus the Blind (reproducing a passage from John the Grammarian as a separate syllogism), and Simplicius, and are all based on Aristotle's discussions of contrariety.

Thus, two Byzantine philosophical works of the sixth century: Zacharias of Mitylene's Adversus Manichaeos and Defensio (Ἀπολογία) attributed to Paul the Persian refute a brief anonymous treatise on two unoriginate principles entitled The Proposition of a Manichaean which most likely survived from a Neoplatonist milieu where it was used as a teaching aid for students of logic. The main polemical method was exposing its logical flaws, primarily, a mistake in category by opposing not contraries, but relatives.[50]

John of Damascus used a similar argument on contraries existing only in substance which therefore is their common and more primary entity, in his ontological criticism of the Manichaean concept of light and darkness as two unoriginate principles. The boundary separating the two in each realm must be considered as its own unoriginate, third principle.

> Thus, the two [principles] either would be in each other or would be circumscribed by place and not be unoriginate. How then can light and darkness be in each other?

[50] Bennett 2021, 419-421.

> For light destroys darkness. If there is no boundary of light and boundary of darkness, neither light would be incircumscribable since it is not everywhere, nor darkness (Εἰ οὐ μεθόριά εἰσι τοῦ φωτὸς καὶ μεθόρια τοῦ σκότους, οὐδὲ τὸ φῶς ἀπερίγραπτον ὡς μὴ πανταχοῦ ὂν οὐδὲ τὸ σκότος). Καὶ οὐ παντελῶς ἄναρχα ἔχοντα τοπικὴν ἀρχήν), and they are not completely unoriginate having a spatial principle. For it is impossible for light and darkness to be entirely unmixed without some barrier or partition.[51]

At first sight, this explanation is puzzling, since circumscription is precisely the capacity to be limited by a certain outline or border, and without the boundary light should be called incircumscribable. None of the manuscripts used for the critical edition indicate a variant reading suggesting a scribal error so we have to assume this is the original formulation. We can solve this puzzle by viewing the example which John of Damascus provides as an illustration to his argument:

> If we lit a lamp at night, the space around the lamp would be lighter, and it would be darker at a small distance until the light completely disappears and there is pure darkness without admixture of light. So either from the beginning darkness was mixed with light and these are not completely opposite and uncommunicating, or something else was the boundary dividing those from the beginning, and thus there are not two principles but three.[52]

These examples are taken from the physical world where unrestrained light does not spread infinitely but fades away with distance and is viewed as an empirical phenomenon paired with darkness as another empirical phenomenon. It is likely that while speaking about light and darkness, as a background text, John of Damascus and his readers had in mind the verse from the Prologue to the Gospel of John "The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it (καὶ τὸ φῶς ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ φαίνει, καὶ ἡ σκοτία αὐτὸ οὐ κατέλαβεν) (John 1:5)." This divine light of the Word is the only incircumscribable light penetrating the whole of creation and beyond, while in the physical world, light is always coupled with darkness as the shadow cast by an object lit by the sun. Physical light and darkness are interrelated natural phenomena – the more light, the less darkness and vice versa; they manifest themselves in space as in a common underlying substance. In addition, given the natural paradigm of John's explanation, not only space might have been the commonality where light and darkness exist but also air, since two theories of vision in Late Antiquity – Aristotelian and Galenic – required the presence of air as a mediating substance.[53]

Moreover, the example also shows that similar to earlier polemicists, John of Damascus does not present light and darkness as absolute contraries, since they involve an infinite number of intermediate states of "lighter" or "darker." John of Damascus describes this kind of contraries in Chapter 57, "On Opposites," in his Dialectica:

> Some contraries have no intermediate, whereas others have....Now, those which have an intermediate are those of which one or the other must not necessarily be in the subject, or in the things of which they are predicated. An example is that of white and black, for these are contraries, yet it is not at all necessary for one of them to be in the body, because it is not necessary for every body to be either white or black–there are gray bodies and tawny ones. ...in the case of those contraries which have intermediates, some of the intermediates have names, as the mean between white and black is called gray.[54]

In the same chapter John of Damascus also mentions that contraries are not primary principles since they "come under the same genus, as white and black under color."[55]

In an earlier article on the Dialogue, the conclusion was set forth that the problem of divine providence was not the main scope of the Dialogue for John of Damascus, but was a corollary of his Christian ontological attempt to ascribe all causality to a single divine and benevolent principle.[56] This research makes it possible to adjust the previous conclusion. The ease in refuting the key points of the Manichaean myth by employing various arguments based on Aristotelian methods of proof, as well as likely adoption of ready-made syllogisms from the school tradition of instruction in logic stand out against the "real voice" of John of Damascus in the second part of the treatise, where he focuses on the matters of divine providence and foreknowledge which would correct voluntary abuses of human free will, and masterfully rethinks the solutions to the problems of theodicy proposed by Basil of Caesarea. This may indicate that the latter issues were targeted in the Dialogue, which can be regarded as a curious practical application of the Aristotelian philosophical tradition of Late Antiquity appearing in the Dialectica.

It does not really matter whether John of Damascus acquired his knowledge of Manichaeism from direct encounter, written testimony on the Manichaean doctrines, or in a course of theological training (or through any combination of these), since it is unlikely that Manichaeism was a real threat to his audience and the primary target of his polemics. It is quite possible that clear Manichean theodicy relegating all very real evils empirically present in the world to an independent principle, which must have been a pressing issue in the times of social and political instability, could have been appealing to some Christians. John of Damascus might have had a multiple purpose in mind while composing his Dialogue, first discrediting the Manichaean doctrines, including Manichaean cosmogony, cosmology, and theodicy based on the developed tradition of anti-Manichaean polemics, and then offering a correct alternative in the form of divine, benevolent foreknowing activity, combined with human free will, which acts not on human free actions but on their consequences. The overall logic of the Dialogue may be viewed in reverse order: everyone who does not believe in the providence of a good God over creation but believes in some independent existence of evil outside of the free choice of rational beings inevitably joins the ranks of the Manichees, whose cosmological myth is based on logical flaws and does not stand elementary rational scrutiny. However, the Dialogue should also be viewed from a wider perspective as a nexus of intersecting themes, including the philosophical thought of the last generation of Greek-speaking thinkers in Palestine. The Dialogue is not only a polemical treatise but a witness to the end of the Late Antique educational curriculum,[57] and the culture of public disputations of Late Antiquity, receiving new life in the Islamic environment.[58]

[57] Following the suggestion that anti-Manichaean polemics in Late Antiquity was a part of standard rhetorical training for the theologians, A. Louth proposed an early date of the Dialogue which John could compose still in Damascus in the course of such training (Louth 2002, 71 based on Lieu 1988, 175). The philological analysis of the parallels between the Dialogue and Dialectica at different stages of its development might clarify this issue.

PREFACE

THE originals of the texts published here, the property of the Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, were among the material brought back from Chinese Turkestan by German archaeological expeditions in the early years of this century. Some of these particular texts soon attracted attention, as representing a work or works of great interest for the general understanding of Manichaeism; but the fragmentary nature of the material delayed its comprehensive study. Notable progress in the reconstruction of the texts was made latterly by Professor W. B. Henning, who was unable, however, to find time to pursue this work. I have been privileged to incorporate, with acknowledgements, the material collected by him in the present edition of the texts, for the preparation of which he generously gave me free access to his collection of photographs of the Berlin manuscripts. This collection, although large, is not complete; but I have been able to compare its contents with the descriptive catalogue made by Dr. Lentz of the Akademie collection, and it seems unlikely that any important Parthian strophic material is missing. The present edition was ready for the printer before it proved possible to get in touch again with the Akademie, to whom I am grateful for raising no objection to its immediate publication. Nevertheless, I much regret that the manuscripts themselves were not accessible when this study was made, since photographs are in many cases a poor substitute for the originals. Care has been taken, however, to indicate all uncertain readings. When reference to the originals is possible, many of these will doubtless be clarified.

The basis of the present work was approved by the University of Cambridge for the degree of Ph.D. in 1952. Professor Henning acted as supervisor of my research, and I am deeply indebted to him for advice and help, unstintingly given. My thanks are also due to Dr. Arthur Waley for his kindness in sparing time to study the Chinese version of a part of these hymn-cycles; and to Dr. Wolfgang Lentz for helpful criticisms, offered with a characteristic magnanimity. Professor Henning very kindly read one set of proofs, and Dr. Gershevitch gave help with advice and with a part of the proofs. I am further very grateful to my friend Mrs. Maria Henning for the kindness and skill with which she helped me prepare the texts for the press.

I should like to express my gratitude to my own college of Newnham for the award of a research studentship which enabled me to begin this study; and to the School of Oriental and African Studies for providing a full subvention for the publication of this work in the London Oriental Series. I should also like to express my appreciation of the skill and helpfulness of the Oxford University Press.

INTRODUCTION

I. PREVIOUS WORK ON THE HYMN-CYCLES

THERE are in Parthian three long texts which are divided into sections known as handāms or 'limbs'. One of these, Wazargān Āfrīwan, is written as prose. The other two, which take their titles from their opening words, are the hymn-cycles Huwīdagmān and Angad Rōšnān. These hymn-cycles are the subject of the present work, in which the term 'handām text' is restricted to them alone.

The first scholar to publish any part of the hymn-cycles was F. W. K. Müller, who illustrated a point of orthography by a verse from the sixth canto of Angad Rōšnān, existing in three manuscripts.[1] Later he used a verse from the seventh canto of the same cycle to explain a phrase.[2] Both verses were reprinted by C. Salemann.[3] Müller did not publish any account of the handām texts; but in 1918 he sent his notes on them to R. Reitzenstein, with permission to use them for his book Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium.[4] He also sent Reitzenstein photographs of several of the handām fragments, which he studied with some help from F. C. Andreas.

Reitzenstein was then seeking to prove that there had existed among the Zoroastrians of Iran a salvation-mystery, inherited by the Manichaeans and transmitted to religious communities in the West.[5] The Manichaean material which he examined for this purpose consisted of the fragments M 7 and M 4 and the following handām fragments: M 88 I, M 89, M 91, M 93, M 96, M 175, M 439, M 774, and T II D 178 I–IV. His interpretation of M 7, namely, that it contained a Zoroastrian hymn adapted by Mani for his own community, has not been accepted.[6] His theories about M 4 and the handām fragments remain to be considered here.

M 4 consists of two double sheets containing both Middle Persian and Parthian texts. It was published by Müller[1] and republished by Salemann,[2] both times with the sheets in the wrong order. The mistake was corrected by Reitzenstein, who made a detailed study of the Parthian text.[3] This is of an unusual character, being made up of the first line or lines of a series of hymns, grouped according to subject-matter. The number of lines in a group varies. Each group has its own heading, but some of the headings are themselves obscure.[4] Two can, however, be readily interpreted: 'zg'myg b'š'h'n ('death hymns') and fršygyrdyg b'š'ẖ ('end-of-the-world hymn(s)'). From these Reitzenstein inferred that the whole text was a death-mass for the World-Soul, whose deliverance from matter 'erst mit dem Ende der Welt vollständig wird'.[5] He explained its unusual character by supposing it to be an abstract of a larger work, namely of the hymn-cycle Angad Rōšnān. The title of the sixth (and last) section of M 4 is nys'r'd 'ngd rwšn'ny b'[š']: 'Begun the hymn(s) connected with Angad Rōšnān.' Beneath this only one line is preserved, which is the opening line of the hymn-cycle. Nothing else survives to show the nature of the angad rōšnānī hymns or their relation with the cycle itself. It was on this evidence that Reitzenstein sought to establish a close connexion between the whole of M 4 and the handām text.

By chance two of the longest fragments of the hymn-cycle available to Reitzenstein bear the title 'Sixth Limb—Angad Rōšnān'.[6] He assumed therefore that the title Angad Rōšnān was peculiar to the sixth section both of the hymn-cycle and of M 4;[7] and thus that each section of M 4 corresponded with a canto of the hymn-cycle. The cantos he believed to be composed of sets of short hymns;[8] and he therefore further supposed that each hymn was [1] H.-R. ii, pp. 49 ff. [2] Man. Stud., pp. 4 ff.

[3] In these pages M 4 is used with reference to the Parthian section of the fragment only.

[4] Thus the title of tngy'nyg b'š'h'n ('body-soul hymns') is recorded in only one other place (see Henning, BBB., p. 47, text d); and those of gy'nyg b'š'ẖ'n ('soul hymns') and mwqr'nyg b'š'ẖ occur only here. The literal meaning even of the latter is unknown. The lines beneath it appear to have a Semitic original (see M. Lidzbarski, 'Ein manichäisches Gedicht', N.G.G.W., 1918, pp. 501 ff.).

[5] Erl. Myst., p. 18. [6] These are M 96 and M 175.

[7] This assumption was particularly rash in the case of M 4, which is a fragment without beginning or end. It is unlikely, therefore, that the numbering of the sections as they survive is significant. This was pointed out by Lentz; see W.–L. i, p. 67.

[8] Reitzenstein was misled by the fact that on M 91 and M 175 there is a represented by its opening line in the corresponding section of M 4. This was an attractive hypothesis, but one based on wrong assumptions. Angad Rōšnān is the title of the whole work;[1] and the cantos of which it is composed consist of unbroken runs of verses. There is thus no basis for a formal comparison between M 4 and the hymn-cycle.

Reitzenstein suggested that Angad Rōšnān had originally consisted of twelve cantos, corresponding with the twelve hours both of the day on which the cycle was chanted and of a symbolic Day of Light.[2] Having named M 4 'die abgekürzte Totenmesse', he called the hymn-cycle correspondingly 'das grosse Erlösungsmysterium'. He used the term 'mystery' in a restricted sense, however, pointing out that in Manichaeism 'von einer kultischen Handlung findet sich keine Spur, und dass wir es nicht mit dem ἱερὸς λόγος eines wirklichen Mysteriums zu tun haben, sollte schon die grosse Zahl der Exemplare beweisen'.[3] He made, nevertheless, a close comparison between the hymn-cycles and the funeral liturgies of gnostic sects. The subject of the Iranian texts he held to be the 'death' and salvation of the First Man, symbolizing the death in matter and deliverance of Light and of individual souls. He supposed at first that the deities Friend of the Lights, Xrōštag, and Padwāxtag figured in the surviving verses.[4] Later, in his book Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen,[5] he abandoned the details blank space marking the end of a canto. As he attributed all verses on these fragments to the sixth canto, he supposed this space to show a division within the canto itself. He was also influenced by M 88 II, containing short Evangelionīg hymns, which have, however, no connexion with the handām texts on M 88 I, as he himself later recognized (see his Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 3. Aufl., p. 277).

[1] This is suggested even by some of the fragments available to Reitzenstein. M 89 bears clearly the title: 'Eighth Limb—Angad Rōšnān'; and M 91 and M 774 both have titles to be restored as 'Seventh Limb—Angad Rōšnān'.

[2] Erl. Myst., pp. 95–96.

[3] Ibid., p. 96.

[4] The words rwšn'n fry'ng, from which he then argued the presence of Friend of the Lights, are used as a laudatory epithet for any god or angel. The deity himself is called in Parthian fryhrwšn. The presence of the god Padwāxtag was assumed from the letter p which appears sometimes in the margins (see below, p. 24); but this device (for padwāg 'answer') probably marks the antiphon, as suggested by Müller.

[5] 3. Aufl. (1927), pp. 53–55. Reitzenstein's earlier theories were admirably summarized by H. Gressmann in Die orientalischen Religionen im hellenistisch-römischen Zeitalter (1930), pp. 172–5. This book, published posthumously, was completed in 1923. It therefore contains no reference to Reitzenstein's modification of his theories.

of this mythological interpretation, but maintained the essentials of his theory.

Reitzenstein had serious handicaps in his study of the handām texts. Knowledge of the Parthian and Middle Persian material was then still very limited, even among Iranists; and he himself was not a specialist in this field.[1] Nevertheless, his contributions to the subject were of great value. He was the first to emphasize the importance of the texts, justly remarking that the number of surviving fragments alone shows that 'es sich um einen Kernpunkt der manichäischen Religion handelt';[2] he realized that the surviving verses represent what must once have been an elaborate work on a grand scale;[3] and he put forward a theory of the nature of that work which, however wrong in detail, is probably in the main not far from the truth.

Five years after Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium had appeared, E. Waldschmidt and W. Lentz published in collaboration Die Stellung Jesu im Manichäismus,[4] a study of the part played by the redeeming deity Jesus in Manichaeism. Lentz, who was responsible for the Iranian part of this work, supposed the Saviour of the handām hymns to be Jesus.[5] He therefore discussed the hymn-cycles at some length, and also published the text, with translation, of several handām fragments. This was the first publication of any considerable amount of text.

The fragments published by Lentz were T II D 178 I–IV and M 855. The former group was known to Reitzenstein, and had been assigned tentatively by him to a second canto. Lentz was able to advance the study of the handām texts considerably by connecting T II D 178 I with a Sogdian colophon, and showing thereby that the fragment belongs in fact to a fifth canto. The colophon in question occurs in a manuscript represented by fragments with the signatures T II K 178, T II D II 170, T II D 185, and T II K. This manuscript appears to have been a hymn-book of considerable size, containing several lengthy works in Sogdian translation. The extant titles and colophons show that in addition to two major Parthian works, Huwīdagmān and Wazargān Āfrīwan, it included the extensive Middle-Persian hymn-cycle Gōwišn īg Grīw Zīndag. Unfortunately the manuscript is now in a fragmentary state. It is written, moreover, in a cursive hand very difficult to decipher.

The Parthian fragment T II D 178 I contains verses from the end of one canto and the beginning of another. The opening words of the second canto are:

'g'm ky[1] bwj'h 'w mn o 'c hw jfr 'bn's

Lentz found a page in the Sogdian MS. containing a colophon that read as follows:

pty'mty pncmy 'nδmy "k'm ky[1] pwz'

i.e. 'Finished the fifth limb: āgām kē bōžā'. Evidently the opening words of a canto, āgām kē bōžā, had here been used to provide a title for the canto as a whole; and Lentz was able therefore to say that T II D 178 I contained the beginning of a fifth 'limb'.[2] On the verso of the Sogdian page bearing this colophon appears the word [γwy]δ*km'n*. This shows that the canto in question belongs to the cycle Huwīdagmān. Lentz did not, however, pursue Reitzenstein's suggestion that there might be two recensions of the hymn-cycles,[3] nor did he seek to distinguish between the different Western Iranian originals represented by the Sogdian translations; for at that time it was not unnaturally assumed that the significant word in the titles of these texts was 'handām' (Sogdian 'nδmy), a word which, in addition to its common meaning of 'limb', and hence, it seems, of 'part, section', has also a particular significance as a religious technical term for a 'limb' of the soul.[4] The occurrence of this word in conjunction with various headings such as Huwīdagmān and Warzargān Āfrīwan was therefore then held to unite what have since been identified as separate texts.

The other text published by Lentz, M 855, was not known to Reitzenstein. This fragment has on its verso page the title: nγs'r'd

[1] Sic; see below, pp. 86 n. 1, 87 n. 1.

[2] Lentz also assigned T II D 178 II–IV to the fifth canto, naturally believing these fragments to form a continuous text with T II D 178 I. This is not, however, the case; see below, pp. 30–31, 35–36, 38–40.

[3] See Erl. Myst., p. 26. Reitzenstein made this suggestion because of the title on M 93 II: 'Sixth Limb—Huwīdagmān.'

[4] See W.–L. i, p. 42 ff.

'ngd rwšn'n, 'Begun (is) Angad Rōšnān'. The first words beneath this are those of M 4 a 18–19, namely, 'ngd rwšn'n fry'ng pṯ 'xšd. It was evident that this was the beginning of the whole cycle. The title on the recto page is damaged, but there too the words 'ngd rwšn'n appear. This misled Lentz into putting the pages into the wrong order. Thus in his publication the last verses of the cycle Huwīdagmān (contained in M 855 R) appear as part of the first canto of Angad Rōšnān.

Lentz accepted Reitzenstein's theories about the structure of the handām texts; and also agreed that there was a connexion between them and M 4. In interpreting them, however, he differed entirely from his predecessor. The third edition of Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen had not then appeared, and he was therefore unaware of Reitzenstein's modification of his mythological interpretations. In any case he rejected these entirely. He dismissed the whole conception of a salvation-mystery as alien to Manichaeism;[1] and rejected also the idea that the hymns were connected with death. He maintained instead that they were liturgical texts for use in the confessional, supporting this theory by comparisons between them, the Great Xwāstwānīft, and a text from the Chinese Hymnscroll. According to him, the Soul in the hymn-cycles was not the World-Soul but that of an individual believer. He interpreted M 4 also as a confessional text; and suggested that in it is to be found 'ein Teil einer Sammlung kurzer Schlussgebete von Beichthymnen . . . die jedesmal in Verbindung mit den zugehörigen grossen Hymnen, die vom Priester rezitiert wurden, von der ganzen Gemeinde gesungen wurden'.[2]

Die Stellung Jesu appeared while the early part of the third edition of Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen was in the press; and Reitzenstein took the opportunity to comment on Lentz's views in the later part of this work.[3] He welcomed his discoveries of the Sogdian material, but refused to accept his new interpretation of the texts, maintaining firmly his own beliefs.

Lentz in his discussion of the handām hymns mentioned the existence of many small fragments of manuscript, apparently containing verses from them, which he himself had not examined. It was clear that the way to a fuller understanding of the hymn-cycles lay through a study of these fragments, a task undertaken by W. B. Henning. In the course of several years of intermittent study Henning succeeded in piecing together a considerable number of fragments, and in acquiring thereby a clearer understanding of the general character of the texts. In 1943 he published a brief account of his findings in a note to Tsui Chi's translation of the Chinese Hymnscroll.[1] In this he showed that there were four distinct hymn-cycles in Middle Persian and Parthian, all of which appear to have been divided into cantos. In distinguishing between the two Parthian cycles he corrected the mistake over the order of the pages in M 855, publishing in evidence a partially preserved colophon to Huwīdagmān from M 256, a fragment which, like M 855, contains the last lines of Huwīdagmān on the recto page and the first lines of Angad Rōšnān on the verso.

[1] See W.–L. i, p. 69. Lentz was justified in this contention, but ignored the fact that Reitzenstein had himself been careful to limit the sense in which he used the word 'mystery' (see above, p. 3). Reitzenstein pointed this out when answering Lentz's criticisms (see Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 3. Aufl., pp. 276–7).

The discovery of the existence of two distinct hymn-cycles in Parthian put the study of the handām texts on a new basis. Henning made yet another illuminating discovery in identifying vv. 262–338 of the Chinese Hymnscroll with the first canto of Huwīdagmān. He published with a translation the fragments he had identified, using a normalized orthography. They were M 93 I, M 233, and M 625 b.

The Chinese title given to the verses from Huwīdagmān is as follows (in Tsui Chi's translation):

'In praise of the World of Light. Containing seventy-eight Odes, each of which is in four lines. By Wei Mo the Mu-shê.'[2]

Henning suggested tentatively that wei (未) might be a mistake for mo (末), in which case Muât-Mâu* might represent Mār Ammō, the name of Mani's great apostle to the Parthians. If this is so, a comparatively precise date for the hymn-cycles can be established.[3]

Henning made two brief references to Mār Ammō's authorship of the hymn-cycles in subsequent articles entitled 'Brāhman'[4] and 'Two Manichaean Magical Texts'.[5] In the former article he also published, to illustrate the meaning of a word, three verses from the seventh canto of Angad Rōšnān. This completed his published work on the hymn-cycles. His textual reconstructions are fully described below.[1]

II. THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF THE HYMN-CYCLES

Angad Rōšnān begins with a soul in distress, for whom 'the hour of life is ended'.[2] Fire and fog daunt it,[3] and hideous demons,[4] and it beseeches its Saviour for redemption.[5] Life ebbs from its body,[6] and its distress deepens; it no longer invokes the Saviour confidently, but asks in despair 'Who shall save me?'[7] For five cantos—as far as can be judged from the surviving fragments—the soul remains lonely, terrified, and weeping. In the sixth the Saviour comes with loving words. The demons slink away,[8] and the soul is promised salvation,[9] and adjured to be steadfast and happy on 'this day of death'.[10] In the last extant verses from the eighth canto the soul tells how, rescued from all sins[11] and clothed in a garment of Light,[12] it has looked upon the dark prison of the body it has abandoned.[13] Huwīdagmān follows the same pattern closely, the chief difference in its extant verses being that it opens with a canto describing Paradise, which is followed by a canto entitled 'The Punishment of Sinners'. The situation at the end of the fourth canto is that found at the beginning of Angad Rōšnān—namely a soul distressed by encircling horrors and yearning for a Saviour. Here too the Saviour appears in the sixth canto and brings the soul comfort and the promise of redemption.

Reitzenstein, influenced by the recurrence of a theme of dissolution, interpreted the hymn-cycles as a death-mass;[14] and his theory receives support from the subsequent discovery of passages in which death is explicitly mentioned. A comparison is therefore necessary between the hymn-cycles and Manichaean funerary literature.

Elegiac poetry, in memory of Mani and other religious leaders, is well attested in Parthian, where it takes the form of an account of the saint's death, or an invocation of him by surviving members of his flock;[1] but funerary hymns, for use at the time of death itself, are barely represented. There is, however, a useful collection in M 4 of the opening lines of such hymns, entitled 'Death-Hymns' ('zg'myg b'š'h'n). These hymns were presumably intended for the funerals of the Elect, for it is assumed in them that the dead man is perfect in virtue, and will ascend to heaven.[2] Two characteristics are common to them all: each is dramatic in form, being in direct speech; and in each the speaker is the soul, which has just left the body,[3] and is sometimes joyful, sometimes in distress.

The key to the interpretation of these hymns is given by Ibn an-Nadīm in the Fihrist, in a passage translated by Flügel as follows:

> Wenn der Tod . . . einem Wahrhaftigen naht, sendet der Urmensch einen Lichtgott in der Gestalt des leitenden Weisen und mit ihm drei Götter und zugleich mit diesen das Wassergefäss,[4] das Kleid, die Kopfbinde, die Krone und den Lichtkranz. . . . Auch erscheint ihm der Teufel der Habgier und der Sinnenlust mit andern Teufeln. Sobald der Wahrhaftige diese erblickt, ruft er die Göttin, welche die Gestalt des Weisen angenommen hat und die andern drei Götter zu Hilfe, und diese nähern sich ihm. Sobald die Teufel sie gewahr werden, wenden sie sich fliehend um.[5]

The hymns in M 4 show the virtuous soul either fearful or hailing with joy the approach of the Saviour. In each the same moment has been chosen, the moment when the soul, freed from the body, awaits its fate after death.

Some of the sections in M 4 are peculiar to that fragment; and one might think these dramatic funerary hymns unusual compositions, had not a similar collection of texts, preserved in their entirety, been found in the Coptic Psalm-Book. This collection

[1] See Mir. Man. iii, d–f.

[2] Thus the dead man confidently invokes the Saviour with his three angels (M 4 c 10–13) and expects his help (ibid. 16–18). The Saviour is gracious to him (ibid. 1–3).

[3] This is stated explicitly in M 4 b 22–c 1 and c 7–10. In the other lines it is implied.

[4] For 'Wassergefäss' read 'Sieg' (see Polotsky in Mani-Fund, p. 72).

consists of the Psalms to Jesus,[1] the first group of the Psalms of Heracleides,[2] and some miscellaneous psalms following these two groups.[3] All are apparently intended, like the Parthian hymns, for use at the funerals of the Elect; and by far the greater number are cast in the same dramatic form, being spoken by the soul of the dead monk or nun.[4] In them too it is made plain that the soul has already left the body, 'the abode of Darkness that is full of fear'.[5] The 'hour of going forth from the body'[6] is almost invariably represented as one of terror and distress, the time 'of the great trouble',[7] the 'hour of need'.[8] The soul, struggling to bear up 'beneath the alarm of death',[9] seeks help desperately from the foes around it—'a merciless crowd like vultures'.[10] The seven demons are spoken of repeatedly;[11] and the soul appeals also from wild beasts,[12] traps,[13] and the powers of heaven and earth, seeking to submerge it.[14] These appeals are never in vain. The Saviour comes, bringing comfort and protection.[15] 'The seven fearful demons' leave the soul, 'their foul hands also empty of (its) blood';[16] it utters praises to its redeemer,[17] and having received the symbols of victory ascends to Paradise, there to become 'divine again even as (it) was'.[18]

The resemblance is striking between these psalms and those represented in M 4; and since the two groups of texts are the products of communities so geographically remote as the Parthian and Coptic Churches, it is safe to assume that they represent a common pattern of funeral hymn, originating in the earliest days of Manichaeism. This assumption is supported by the fact that there are marked similarities between these hymns and those of Mandaeism, a religion which appears to have developed in the same area as Manichaeism, and to have shared with it some of the [4] There are exceptions. In Psalms cclviii and cclxxix the living address the soul; Psalm ccliv celebrates the triumphant virtue of Mani himself, and Psalm cclxv is largely hortatory. Psalm ccl may be meant for the dying rather than the dead. These constitute a handful of exceptions to the general type.

same formative influences.[1] Considerable collections of Mandaean funeral texts have survived,[2] some of which have already been considered by Reitzenstein in connexion with the Parthian material.[3] The texts are more varied in character than the surviving Manichaean ones, and their use is not always restricted to the celebration of death alone.[4] Those which most closely resemble the Manichaean begin when the soul has already left the body, and is waiting in loneliness and fear for a redeemer to lead it to Paradise.[5] The majority share two important characteristics with the Manichaean hymns: they are dramatic in form, being attributed largely to the soul; and their dominant theme is the ascent of the soul to Paradise after it leaves the body.

The ascent of the soul after death held a place of paramount importance in the older gnostic religions,[6] in which it was enacted ritually both for the preparation of the living and the furtherance of the dead. From what has survived of their liturgical writings it appears that in these religions the ascent was an ordeal to be surmounted only by the initiate dead; the seven malignant planets barred the soul's upward path, and could be rendered powerless only by a set form of words. If this trial by knowledge were surmounted, a test of virtue followed; but virtue without esoteric knowledge was useless.[7] The ascent of the soul is similarly represented as an ordeal in a number of the Mandaean masqātā,[8]

[1] A brief reference to this similarity has been made recently by T. Säve-Söderbergh in his Studies in the Coptic Manichaean Psalm-Book. This work is devoted almost entirely to the 'Psalms of Thomas', which are believed by Prof. Polotsky to be Mandaean writings incorporated in the Psalm-Book, and not therefore relevant to our consideration of Manichaean funeral literature. Of the Psalms to Jesus the author says that they 'were in all probability used at a cultic ceremony corresponding to the Mandaean death mass' (op cit., p. 86).

[6] It has been contended that this doctrine of the ascent was both the central point of Gnosticism and the common factor of its many sects; see W. Anz, Zur Frage nach dem Ursprung des Gnostizismus, pp. 1–58.

[7] It is expressly said in the Pistis Sophia that a virtuous man cannot attain heaven without a knowledge of the mysteries (ch. 103; see C. Schmidt's translation, 2nd ed., p. 192, ll. 23–29); whereas a sinful man can be rescued from the damnation he deserves if a mystery be said for him after death (ch. 108; Schmidt, pp. 201–2).

whose recitation was likewise regarded as itself aiding the soul's passage.[1] The Manichaean funeral literature represents a different system of belief, according to which gnosis had to bear fruit within this life. Virtue, it was taught by Mani, depended on an understanding of the principles of Light and Darkness; but this understanding, although it saved the enlightened from sin, could not compensate, before or after death, for sin committed. Good actions, not words, secured a passage heavenwards for the soul:

> They wait not for a defence, to teach how to answer, on this day, > but he that has a good deed, let him put his trust in his deeds.[2]

The ascent was not, therefore, an ordeal, but a triumph, which no living man could help or hinder. The Manichaean funeral hymns could not, accordingly, be regarded as potent in themselves to help the dead.

Doctrinal differences have not, however, affected the formal likeness of the Manichaean funeral literature to the Mandaean; nor have they abolished from it vestiges of what are still realities in the Mandaean liturgy—the enemies that flock round even the virtuous soul, and the watchposts of the hostile planets along its heavenward way.[3]

A dramatic form is found also in the two Parthian hymn-cycles. The similarities in form and content between them and the short funeral psalms are immediately evident. Dissimilarities exist also, some of which may be attributed merely to the difference in scale of the works. The most striking of them, however, is a divergence in attitude toward the soul. In the majority of the funeral psalms the souls are treated as ethical entities, conscious of the existence they have just left and of their moral achievements within it, and still attached to their 'brethren' and 'parents of the flesh' whom they exhort not to mourn.[4] In the handām texts the soul is an innocent and passive member of the exiled Light, and humanity is overwhelmed by an impersonal grandeur. Youth and age, family and friends have no place there. The soul is 'out of humanity's reach, and must finish (its) journey alone' amid the falling of worlds and shattering of nature's laws.

The contrast is sufficiently marked to appear at first a counterpoise to the many resemblances between the two sets of texts. Yet there is one Coptic psalm in which a similar treatment of the soul is maintained throughout.[1] This psalm is so important for comparison with the hymn-cycles that it is quoted here in full:

Come to me, my kinsman, the Light, my guide.
. . . my soul, bear up: thou hast thy Saviour:
thy defence is Christ, for he will receive thee into his Kingdom.
Since I went forth into the darkness I was given a water to drink which
. . . me. I bear up beneath a burden which is not my own.
I am in the midst of my enemies, the beasts surrounding me;
the burden which I bear is of the powers and principalities.
They burned (?) in their wrath, they rose up against me, they ran to . . . me, like sheep that have no shepherd.
Matter and her sons divided me up amongst them, they burnt (?) me in their fire, they gave me a bitter likeness.
The strangers with whom I mixed, me they know not; they tasted my sweetness, they desired to keep me with them.
I was life to them, but they were death to me; I bore up beneath them, they wore me as a garment upon them.
I am in everything, I bear the skies, I am the foundation, I support the earths, I am the Light that shines forth, that gives joy to souls.
I am the life of the world: I am the milk that is in all trees: I am the sweet water that is beneath the sons of Matter.
. . . I went forth to the . . .
. . . the Aeons . . . they sent me forth to the . . .
I bore these things until I had fulfilled the will of my Father;
the First Man is my father whose will I have carried out.
Lo, the Darkness I have subdued; lo, the fire of the fountains I have extinguished it, as the Sphere turns hurrying round, as the sun receives
the refined part of life.
O soul, raise thy eyes to the height and contemplate thy bond . . .
. . . thou hast reached it; lo, thy Fathers are calling thee.
Now go aboard the Ships of Light and receive thy garland of glory and return to thy kingdom and rejoice with all the Aeons.
Glory and honour to our Lord Mani and his holy Elect and the soul of the blessed Mary.[2]

[1] Psalm ccxlvi.

[2] Ps. Bk. 54–55.

The first few lines and the last of this psalm suggest that it was composed for the death of one of the Elect. It follows the pattern of the other funerary texts, beginning with an appeal to the Saviour, and ending with the soul's ascent in triumph. But the body of the psalm is not devoted to the dead man's life and virtues: his little existence is merged instead into that of Light as a whole. Since the world began, the Light which makes up his soul has been exiled from its home, suffering amid matter; at its release through death, it rejoices. The treatment is impressive. The psalm does not evoke the human sympathies touched by some of the others; but by dissolving the bonds of personal existence, it awakes a sense of awe and humility before the greatness of the divine struggle.

This short work gives a key to the understanding of the extensive hymn-cycles, in which the treatment of the soul appears to be the same. This treatment involves necessarily the conception of 'the saved Saviour'. The god addresses the soul both as his redeemer and the one he has come to redeem.[1] A few similar passages occur in the Coptic psalms.[2]

We know little as yet of Manichaean ritual, and to speculate about the liturgical use of the hymns is largely unprofitable. It is known from the Hymnscroll that the first canto of Huwīdagmān was sometimes detached from the rest of the cycle, and that its first verse was used in congregation as a response.[3] This canto is complete in itself, however, and being unusually joyous must have lent itself to general and independent use. There is a possibility that the hymn-cycles, like the Mandaean masqātā, were used for other liturgical purposes as well as the celebration of death; but there is no evidence for this, or for Reitzenstein's attractive theory that they consisted of twelve cantos, one for each hour of the day of celebration. All that can be said with probability is that they were primarily intended for the funeral-services of the Elect, whose deaths were thereby celebrated in a manner which was partly symbolic, so that they typified also the final redemption of Light.

The relationship between the hymn-cycle Angad Rōšnān and the angad rōšnānī hymns of M 4 remains regrettably obscure. Further

[1] See, for example, A.R. VI 9, 21, 56 (the soul as redeemer); and ibid. 31–33, 43–45 (the god as redeemer). The alternation led both Reitzenstein and Lentz to suppose the words of the god a dialogue.

[2] e.g. Ps. Bk. 75^{5}, 86^{27}, 87^{18-24}. (In the last passage, l. 20, Prof. Polotsky emends the translation to 'The Father, the King of the crowns—I left him, [I] being pure from . . .').

evidence seems necessary before this can be decided, or M 4 interpreted as a whole.

III. THE GOAL OF THE DEPARTED SPIRIT AND THE IDENTITY OF THE SAVIOUR

As funeral texts the hymn-cycles are concerned with the fate of the righteous dead; and if they were wholly preserved, they would doubtless furnish a full exposition of Manichaean doctrine on it. Even as they are, they provide some useful evidence for an obscure point, namely the immediate goal of the departed spirit. This is a matter which has created some conflict of opinion among scholars. Jackson in his monograph on the fate of the soul[1] assumed—ignoring any other possibility—that the soul went straight to the Eternal Paradise; and to this Waldschmidt and Lentz gave their considered assent:

> Das 'ewige Lichtreich' ist das Ziel der individuellen Erlösung. Im Gegensatz dazu steht das 'neue Lichtreich'. . . . Dies ist ein Wohnsitz der kosmogonischen Götter.[2]

Polotsky, however, stated that the soul went after death to the New Paradise.[3] That the matter was one of some complexity even for Manichaeans is shown by a question about it which survives in a Sogdian fragment.[4] This runs as follows:

> [The seventy-first] question thus: 'When a second time they will have been created afresh in perfection by the Great King, then in which land will their kingship secondly be? Will it be in the Real Paradise together with the Great King, or in the New Paradise?'

Unfortunately only the preliminaries of the answer survive; and the problem has therefore to be decided on other evidence.

The New Paradise, created by the Great Builder,[5] was made from the Eternal Paradise, to which it is to be restored at the end of the world.[1] It shares therefore the nature of the Eternal Paradise, with which it is consubstantial. In its separate existence only is it temporary; and its inhabitants, who will return with it at the end to the Paradise of Light, may be said already to enjoy in it the sweetness of eternal life.[2]

The function of the New Paradise most clearly stated is that of a resting-place for the redeeming gods, who are banished from the Eternal Paradise during their struggle to recover the lost Light. The purpose of this banishment is to secure the unbroken peace of the World of Light. At the end of the world the redeeming gods retire to the New Paradise together with its king, the First Man,[3] and rest there with their attendant divinities and the last particles of rescued Light.[4] Thereafter they return to the Eternal Paradise, and once more behold the Father of Greatness.[5]

In several places it is stated that the Light which remains imprisoned until the end of the world will ascend as the 'Last Man' to the New Paradise, and go thence by the side of the 'First Man' into the presence of the Father.[6] The problem is whether this was the course travelled by all particles of redeemed Light, or whether the souls rescued before frašēgird returned directly to the Eternal Kingdom.

In Parthian and Middle Persian the New Paradise is called whyšt rwšn, nwg (nw'g) šhr and nwg (nw'g) šhr'n.[7] There are a number of references to it as the goal of the dead, of which the following will suffice as examples:

I reverence you, O God; forgive my sins, save my soul, lead it up to the New Paradise![8]

'The souls will go to the Light, they will put on the body of the Father. They will be in glory within the New Aeon for ever and ever.'[9]

[9] M 285, ll. 88–92 (an unpublished Parthian text). The original is as follows:

Sometimes the destination itself is vaguely named, but mention of the First Man (Ōhrmizd) makes it clear which Paradise is intended:

'Then shall you receive, at the end, helm, garland and diadem from the god Ōhrmizd, the Father, within the Paradise of Light. There shall you rejoice and prosper for ever, (and) be happy in gladness.'[1]

The Coptic texts contain a good deal of material about the fate of the soul, but not much explicitly concerning the New Paradise. In one of the 'Psalms of the Bema' the soul is promised salvation within 'its kingdom', where

> Thy Father, the First Man, will give thee thy life (?) . . . who (?) . . . to give it since thy beginning; the divine envoy of Truth will give thee the diadem of Light; . . . will give thee thy garland of renown.[2]

The psalm comes to an end almost upon these words, the soul being left in bliss with the First Man. A fuller statement of the doctrine of redemption in the New Paradise is contained in one of the 'Psalms of Heracleides',[3] whose subject is the return of the First Man to Paradise after the triumph of the Light. In it the psalmist creates what is evidently a conscious parallel between this return, constituting the ultimate victory of the First Man, and the original re-entry of the First Man into Paradise after his encounter with the powers of Darkness.[4] On the earlier occasion the Spiritus Vivens had been sent as Envoy to summon the First Man back to consciousness, and had been asked by him:

> Comment vont nos pères, les fils de la lumière, dans leur cité?[5] and had answered 'Ils vont bien'. In the Coptic psalm an Envoy is sent in the same way to summon the First Man at the end of the world. He knocks at the gates of his dwelling-place and rouses him, šwyynd gy'n̲n 'w rwšn oo t̲nb'r cy pydr pdmwcynd oo n'zynd 'ndr nw"g šhr 'w y'wyd y'wyd'n.

[1] Mir. Man. ii, p. 333[4–8].

[2] Ps. Bk. 22[16–19].

[3] Ibid. 197–202.

[4] The parallel is so closely worked out that Widengren has been deceived into thinking that the psalm refers in fact to the first scene in the battle of redemption, instead of the last. See his Mesopotamian Elements in Manichaeism, pp. 74–76. That this is not the case is shown by the interchanges between the Envoy and the First Man; see, for example, p. 201, ll. 17–18:

> 'The Light is set over the king of the Darkness: his host is bound, it is fettered. Take the news.'

[5] See Theodor bar Konai, apud Cumont, Recherches, i, p. 24.

to be greeted with the same questions that were asked in the beginning:

> What does my Father do, the Father of the Lights? . . .
> outside him. Tell me the news.
> What do the twelve Aeons do, whom I left surrounding > the Father? Tell [me] the news.[1]

The Envoy answers that all is well in Paradise, 'the Gods rejoicing'[2] at the victory gained; and summons the First Man to return there, accompanied by his 'garlanded host'.[3] This host is evidently the assembly of victorious souls in the New Paradise, who are also spoken of as the 'merchandise' of the First Man, recovered by him from the powers of Darkness:

> The Fathers of Light came that they might help their loved > one. Take the news.
> They helped the First Man, he cried before him > in joy: 'Behold me, behold my merchandise'. Lo.
> Great is the joy that there was, the First Man being > in their midst, laden with garlands and palms. Lo, this is the news.[4]

In the final verses the psalmist speaks in his own person, making clear the parable to his hearers:

> May it happen to us together that we may be counted in his > merchandise and rejoice with all the Aeons. Lo, this is the news.
> May we be counted among those of the right hand and inherit our > kingdom. Lo, this is the news.
> And may we live with our kinsmen from everlasting to everlasting.
> Lo, this is the news.[5]

The belief expressed here is that the First Man gathers the redeemed in the New Paradise during the centuries, until he has won back all, or almost all, that he had lost, and can bear them with him to the Eternal Paradise in a celestial triumph.

These texts, Coptic and Iranian, establish a Manichaean doctrine of immediate redemption in the New Paradise, followed by ultimate union with the Paradise of Light. Yet such texts, although clear in the evidence they yield, are few in number. By far the most references to the destination of the soul are in ambiguous, general terms such as 'the land of the gods', 'the city of the blessed'. This is the case, not only in hymns of a general character,

[1] Ps. Bk. 198$^{23-26}$. [2] Ibid. 199^{10}. [3] Ibid. 201$^{7-8}$.
[4] Ibid. 202$^{12-17}$. [5] Ibid. 202$^{18-23}$.

but also in texts of some doctrinal precision, as for example the Middle Persian S 9, where the salvation of a believer is described in the following terms:

> He put off the body of death and was for ever saved, > and he ascended into Paradise, into that land of the blessed.[1]

What complicates matters still more is that some texts not only do not particularize the New Paradise as the destination of redeemed souls, but actually make it clear that the Eternal Paradise is meant. Thus the Chinese texts studied by Waldschmidt and Lentz distinguish in terminology between the two Paradises; and in more than one case the terms for the Eternal Paradise are there used to indicate the goal of the returning souls.[2] The following lines from an unpublished Parthian hymn have the same decisiveness:

> Lay hold upon salvation and freedom from hurt. They prepare for you a tabernacle of the spirit. Enter into the kingdom before the Father of Greatness, and in his presence become endued with your own piety, stillness and purity.[3]

The mention of the Father of Greatness makes it clear that 'the kingdom' here means the Eternal Paradise. One of the Coptic funeral psalms yields a similar passage. In it the 'garlanded soul' having been ferried from moon to sun, enters into Paradise and is in the presence of the 'Father of the Lights'.[4]

There seems thus a contradiction in the Manichaean texts themselves. It is likely, however, that it is only apparent, not real. The existence of a doctrine of immediate redemption in the New Paradise is clearly attested, harmonizes admirably with other of Mani's teachings, and is unlikely to be a later development. It adds, however, a complexity to an already complex scheme; and postpones the moment of entry into the presence of the Father. Poetic licence seems to allow, therefore, that the distinction which it involves should in many texts be glossed over or ignored; and that occasionally the gulf of time and space should be surpassed, the souls of the saved being imagined as standing now where they will ultimately be, in the presence of the Father himself. Presumably even in such cases it is not so much that the doctrine of redemption in the New Paradise is opposed to that of redemption in the Eternal Paradise as that it is swallowed up in the latter conception.

If we look beyond the Manichaean texts to the works of non-Manichaean writers, we find that the doctrine of the New Paradise is ignored by the polemicists, as a minutia of dogma containing no matter for mockery. It has a place, however, in the writings of the more detached Ibn an-Nadīm. There are two passages in the Fihrist in which Ibn an-Nadīm describes the soul's journey heavenward. The first occurs in his initial brief summary of Mani's teaching.[1] Here he states simply that the souls ascend by the Column of Glory to the moon, that the moon gives them to the sun, and that the sun transfers them to the 'World of Praise', where they go to 'the highest, pure Light'. The expression الى النّور الأعلى الخالص must refer to the heart of the Eternal Paradise itself; and it seems that in this epitome Ibn an-Nadīm was content to ignore the existence of the New Paradise. The second passage,[2] contained in the chapter upon the fates of men, is more detailed. According to it, the virtuous soul is approached upon death by a god with three supporting divinities who set upon it crown and diadem and garment,

وعرجوا به فى عمود السّبح الى فلك القمر والى الانسان القديم والى النّهنهة امّ الأحياء الى ما كان عليه اوّلاً فى جنان النّور

This passage runs as follows in Flügel's translation:

. . . und steigen mit ihm auf der Säule des Lobpreises zu der Sphäre des Mondes, zu dem Urmenschen und zu der Nahnaha der Mutter der Lebendigen bis zu dem Zustand, in dem er zuerst in den Paradiesen des Lichts war.[3]

This account is at variance with other descriptions of the soul's heavenward journey, as Flügel pointed out: 'Die Stationen der Seele sind hier theilweise auf noch unbekannte Art bezeichnet.'[4] The anomaly lies in the mention of the First Man and the Mother of the Living as representing some station or stations on the path of the soul's ascent. Both these gods have thrones in two distinct places. Firstly, they are enthroned in the moon and sun respectively; but the moon having already been mentioned by name, the gods can hardly represent these places here.[1] Secondly, they both have thrones, as redeeming gods, in the New Paradise. The First Man is the ruler of this realm, and therefore its natural representative. The Mother is closely associated in mythology with her 'son' (as is shown by her Middle Persian name 'Mother-of-the-god-Ōhrmizd', 'whrmyzdby m'd). She is regarded, moreover, as 'mother' of all the redeeming gods who inhabit the New Paradise.[2] It is fitting, therefore, that she should be beside the First Man in the New Paradise, as the Great Spirit is beside the Father in the Eternal Kingdom.[3] It is thus probable that in this context the First Man and the Mother together represent the New Paradise.

Ibn an-Nadīm's second account is thus orthodox, except for the omission of any mention of the sun. This omission is found elsewhere,[4] and is understandable: the sun only carried farther the process of purification begun in the moon, and the visible waxing and waning of the latter made it of more significance as a symbol to watchers upon earth. With this omission excepted, the progression given by him here, namely Column of Glory—moon—New Paradise—Eternal Paradise, accords exactly with what we have seen to be the Manichaean doctrine in its fullness.

Some details of the soul's ascent are given in the sixth cantos both of Huwīdagmān and Angad Rōšnān. The account in the former is slightly the fuller. In it the god promises to rescue the soul from its foes and to lead it up to 'the kingdom' (hw šhr)[5] where he will show it its Fathers. After an unfortunate gap in the text this kingdom is further described as 'a vast and lofty fortress' raised by divine evocation,[6] 'the palace of the primeval First-Born',[7] wherein he puts on the garment of happiness,[8] and bestows garlands upon all his comrades[9] and upon the Elect.[10] The only realm divinely created is the New Paradise (for the Eternal Paradise is terra ingenita, coexistent with the Father of Light himself); and one may compare this description of it with that in the Coptic psalm quoted above, where it is pictured as a 'tower'[1] with defensive gates.[2] The 'primeval First-Born' (nwxz'd hsyng) is evidently the First Man (elsewhere mrdwhm hsyng) who rules the New Paradise, and is several times spoken of as there bestowing garlands upon victorious souls.[3] A further gap of five verses follows this description, and the subsequent verses bring us to the defeat of the (Dark) Powers,[4] and

> . . . the day when He will reveal (His) form,
> [the] beneficent [Father], the Lord of the Aeons of Light.[5]

The Father shows himself only when all Light is redeemed, and the gods are once more in his presence. Here again, therefore, the soul's return to the Eternal Kingdom follows after a sojourn with the First Man in the New Paradise.

The surviving cantos of Angad Rōšnān contain much immediate solace for the soul, but less prophecy about its future. The god promises to open before it the gates in the heavens,[6] and to lead it to its home, 'the blessed place'.[7] There he will show it the 'noble Father'[8] and the 'Mother of the Beings of Light',[9] and also all the holy brethren,[10] with whom the soul shall dwell in happiness for ever. With this the canto ends, and later fragments do not amplify its account. It is apparent, however, that it contains a promise of salvation in the New Paradise. The 'noble Father' to whom the soul is led could, as far as the words themselves go, be either the First Man or the Father of Greatness; but the supreme deity, being hidden in his own light until he chooses to reveal himself, cannot be shown to the redeemed by one of his own emanations. The 'noble Father' must, therefore, be here the First Man; and this identification is supported by the mention in the next verse of his 'Mother', the Mother of the Living (here rwšn'n m'd).[11] It is interesting to find the New Paradise here represented by the same pair of divinities as are named by Ibn an-Nadīm in his account. Both the hymn-cycles thus present the Manichaean doctrine in its rigour.

[11] This deity appears under various names in Parthian: m'd, m'd jywndg, and rd'w'n m 'd are also recorded.

The leader to Paradise[1] is called in the Fihrist 'the guiding Sage',[2] and in the Hymnscroll 'the Master of Doctrine',[3] both titles which may well indicate the Nous. This deity is so closely connected with the Manichaean Church that he can be identified with its personification (M. Pers. farrah-ī dēn, Turkish nom qutï),[4] which in two other texts is said to bestow the Victory on the righteous soul.[5] In Kephalaia VII the god is called 'the Figure of Light', and should be either Mani or his contemporary successor.[6] In the Parthian M 4 it is Mani who is invoked with the three angels;[7] and he meets the soul in one of the Coptic psalms.[8] In most of these, however, the guide is Jesus.

There are thus three figures named in the role of Saviour—the Nous, Mani, and Jesus. In the handām texts the deity is not named, but is referred to only in general terms, such as 'friend', 'lord', 'sovereign', 'envoy', 'saviour'. The omission of a name may be deliberate, so that the Saviour can represent all redeeming gods; or it may be due to the chance of survival. Whatever the reason, the god remains anonymous.

IV. THE MANUSCRIPTS

The hymn-cycles exist in fragments from many manuscripts. Some of these were works of art, elegantly written upon large pages; some were small, their verses written in a cramped hand; and most were of average size, in clear and pleasant scripts. Varied as was their original character, all have been reduced to a uniformly fragmentary state. Of their hundreds of sheets, five only survive intact. The rest are represented by fragments containing from half a line to half a page of text.

The text of the hymn-cycles is invariably set out in verses, with a space between them. The verses are in two lines,[9] each with a caesura in the middle, which is marked sometimes by one dot,

[1] Some accounts of death omit this deity. The soul instead goes by itself into the presence of a judge, and there receives the three trophies. Yet other accounts confuse the two versions. For an explanation of this see Polotsky in Mani-Fund, pp. 72–73.

sometimes by two, and sometimes by a space between dots. One or two manuscripts also have a dot sometimes at the end of a line, as a space-filler.[1] When a line of verse is unusually long, the last word of a first line is sometimes written at the beginning of the second, or the first word of a second line at the end of the first. In such cases the end of the verse-line is always marked by a dot.

The manuscripts usually have ten verses to a page, and a heading. The only exception known is T II D 178, which has five verses to a page and no heading.[2] The verses are grouped in cantos, and one canto is divided from the next by the space of a verse left blank. The heading gives the name of the cycle on the verso page, and the number of the canto on the recto, as in the following example:

M 96 (R) šhwm hnd'm (V) 'ngd rwšn'n

Exceptions occur only at the beginning of each cycle, where the first pages bear, instead of a canto-number, a general heading. The following are examples:

M 233 (R) nys'r'd hwydgm'n (V) hwydgm'n
M 855 (R) 'ngd rwšn'n (V) nys'r'd 'ngd rw[šn'n]

Some of the manuscripts have a p in the margin by alternate verses. Others containing the same verses do not. Müller's explanation, that this p (for padwāg 'answer') marks the antiphon, has been generally accepted. In the fifth canto of Huwīdagmān and the seventh of Angad Rōšnān p stands by the second verse and subsequent even verses; but (if the identification of the fragments concerned is correct) in the first and sixth cantos of Angad Rōšnān it is the opening verse which has the p. In the case of the first canto the identification is, however, very doubtful;[3] but if some cantos contained an odd number of verses, and the cantos were chanted continually, the position of the p may have varied from one to the next.[4] On a verso page the p is written thus, ⌐; but on a recto page it is upside down, thus, ¬. The difference is sometimes helpful for establishing the order of pages.

The manuscripts were made up of separate quires, each containing a considerable number of sheets. Surviving fragments show that in one manuscript verses from the first to sixth cantos of Huwīdagmān were contained in a single quire;[1] and in another verses from the first to seventh cantos of Angad Rōšnān.[2] In the latter case there appear to have been twelve double sheets in the quire. Probably the average manuscript contained several sets of texts. Fragments exist from at least seven manuscripts which contained both hymn-cycles; and it is a possibility that the two cycles were regularly written together. This cannot be established, however, since many of the forty-odd handām manuscripts are represented by a single fragment. There is evidence for other texts being contained in the same manuscripts with the hymn-cycles. M 88 and M 91, for example, have verses from Evangelionīg hymns on one sheet and from Angad Rōšnān on the other; and the manuscript represented by fragments with the signature T II D 178 contained not only both hymn-cycles, but other verse and prose texts in Iranian, and Uigur texts as well. The fact that the hymn-cycles appear together in the same manuscripts is unfortunate for the reconstruction of the text, as it makes manuscript-evidence useless for distinguishing between the cycles.

[2] Photographs of two sheets from this manuscript are reproduced in W.–L. i (Taf. IV). The manuscript is further distinguished by being written in a script peculiarly difficult to read (see Reitzenstein's comments in Erl. Myst., p. 27); and by some anomalies of spelling which suggest a copyist familiar with Sogdian (see A.R. I 12a, 18a, 19a; VI 5a).

V. THE RECONSTRUCTION OF THE TEXT

The mutilation of the manuscript-material made it at first difficult to discern even the general character of the hymn-cycles; and the reconstruction of the text, initiated by Müller and Andreas,[3] and carried on chiefly by Henning, demanded much patient work. Its progress depended in the first place on the discovery of fragments with titles, or adequate traces of titles, by which they could be assigned to their proper place within the cycles. Thirteen such fragments exist for Angad Rōšnān and six for Huwīdagmān. With them it was possible to construct a skeleton framework to which other fragments again could be attached. Since the manuscripts concerned are numerous, the connecting of these fragments has been chiefly on the basis of subject-matter alone; but in several instances it has been possible to piece together fragments from the same page of a single manuscript.

[1] See below, pp. 32, 33. [2] See below, p. 34.

[3] The contributions of these two scholars to the reconstruction of the hymn-cycles cannot be assessed separately, since Reitzenstein did not state the extent of his indebtedness to them individually.

The full scope of the work of reconstruction appears from the texts themselves, reproduced below. Here I propose to describe briefly the stages by which this reconstruction was achieved, and also to indicate as precisely as possible the contributions made by each scholar who has worked in this field.[1]

Let us begin with the better-preserved cycle, Angad Rōšnān. Two of the five complete manuscript-sheets mentioned above contain verses from the sixth canto of this cycle, and on each its title is fully preserved, namely

(R) šhwm hnd'm (V) 'ngd rwšn'n

These two sheets have the signatures M 96 and M 175. To them Müller and Andreas joined M 88 I, another fragment of considerable length. This has no title, but contains almost the same verses as M 96. Another fragment, M 91, from the next page of the same manuscript as M 88 I, has the title

(R) hf[twm] ẖnd'm (V) 'ng[d rw]šn'n

but its recto page contains the last verses of the sixth canto, also preserved on M 175. These four fragments provided a series of twenty-three verses at the end of the sixth canto. To them Henning added M 675, which has the title

(R) šhwm hnd'm (V) ['ng]d rwšn'n

This fragment he showed to belong to the preceding page of the same manuscript as M 175. Since M 675 V 1 = M 88 I R 2+ M 96 R 2, this discovery added nine more verses to the series, with a gap of five verses, for M 675 consists only of the upper half of a page. This gap I was later able to fill by verses from the verso pages of four small fragments, M 326, T II D 178 VIa and VIIa, and T I a 1537 II. These fragments overlap with each other, and the recto pages of T II D 178 VIa and VIIa overlap in turn with M 675 R (there being only five verses to a page in T II D 178). The verses on the recto pages of the other two fragments precede those on M 675 R, with one verse missing in between. The number of verses known from the end of A.R. VI was thus increased to thirty-six. I was also able to add to the text established by Müller and Andreas the small piece T I α 1538 II.

[1] Müller, Andreas, and Lentz were able to base their work on a study of the original fragments. Henning also studied the material at first in the original; but for his later work he used an almost complete series of photographs in his own possession. These he very kindly allowed me to use in my turn (see preface), since the original fragments are not at present accessible.

The seventh canto of Angad Rōšnān is also well represented by readily decipherable fragments. Two of those belonging to the sixth canto contain verses from the seventh also. These are M 91 (with the title of 'Seventh Limb', as we have seen) and M 175. To these Müller and Andreas added M 774, from the next page of the same manuscript as M 175, with the title:

(R) [hf]twm hnd'm (V) 'ngd rw[šn'n] and M 439, which has no title, but whose contents overlap with those of M 175 and M 91. To these four pieces Henning joined eight smaller fragments: M 690 (from the same page of manuscript as M 439); M 459 a and M 817 (fragments of one page); M 517 (with a title); M 489 a (from the same manuscript and possibly the same page as M 774); M 287 and T I α (fragments of the one page, on which part of a title is preserved, with the number of the canto missing); and M 578 (from the same manuscript as M 96). I was later able to add three more tiny fragments: T I α 1539 II, T I α 1540 II, and T II D 178 IX g.

Henning reconstructed a further group of fragments from this canto, to which he gave the signature A.R. VIIa. This group depends on the fragments T III D 280 and M 667, which bear the words, respectively:

(R) [ ]twm hnd(')[ ] (V) [ ] rw(š)[ ]

(R) [ ]twm [ ] (V) [ ] rwš[ ]

In M 667 a dot is visible over the gap before the t of]twm, making the restoration of [hf]twm certain; and since the two fragments contain in part the same verses, both can be assigned with assurance to the seventh canto. Henning further pieced together with M 667 three other bits from the same manuscript-page, namely M 620, M 918 a, and T I D 51. He thus restored a series of seventeen verses, with a gap. A.R. VII contains thirty-six verses, and so there survive fifty-three verses from this canto, which even so is evidently not complete.

The eighth canto of Angad Rōšnān is represented by the fragment M 89, which has the title

(R) hštwm ẖnd'm (V) 'ngd rwšn'n

To this I added the small fragment T II D 67 (12 p.) j.

For the first canto of Angad Rōšnān there exist three fragments with a title. One is M 855 V, which was published by Lentz. On this the title runs:

(V) nys'r'd 'ngd rw[šn'n]

i.e. 'Begun (is) Angad Rōšnān'. The first verse on this fragment is actually the first verse of the canto and cycle. Henning identified with the verses on M 855 V those on M 256 V, thus restoring in part the first four verses of the cycle. The fragment T II D 79 (1 p.) bears traces of the same title as M 855 V, namely

(R) ny(s)['r'd 'n]g[d rwšn'n] (V) ['ngd rwšn']n

The position of the g on the recto page showed that 'ngd rwšn'n was to be restored and not hwydgm'n; and our present knowledge, thanks to Henning, of the whole of the first canto of Huwīdagmān proves the correctness of this. Henning discovered that the verso of T II D 79 overlaps with the recto of M 780, a fairly well-preserved fragment with seven verses on each page; and to M 780 he joined M 831 and T II D 140, two small fragments from the same page of the same manuscript. M 831 contains verses from the bottom of a page, and its relationship with M 780 shows that the latter fragment is from the top of a page. It is almost certain that for the beginning of the first canto the scribe would take a fresh page;[1] and if the first verse of A.R. I is set at the top of a page, and there are ten verses to a page, it follows that M 780 R I must have a number ending in 1 in the total series—viz. 11, 21, or 31, &c.; and since T II D 79 V 1 = M 780 R 3 it follows that T II D 79 R 1 must have a number ending in 3 in the total series—viz. 3, 13, or 23, &c. But the caption 'Begun is . . .' is naturally restricted to the first page or two of the cycle;[2] and on the basis of these calculations Henning identified T II D 79 R 1 with A.R. I 3. This fragment thus follows directly on M 855 V (= A.R. I 1–2). The identification, based on calculation, is supported by the fact that M 855 V contains traces of a third verse, and has two letters, appropriately spaced, in common with the first line of T II D 79.

[2] Thus in Huwīdagmān two fragments containing the opening verses have the title nys'r'd hwydgm'n; but M 93 I (whose first verse = H. I 22) has the title nxwyn hnd'm hwydgm'n.

Henning added two other fragments, namely M 673 and M 889, to the group which he had thus created for the beginning of A.R. I; and to these eight fragments I was able to join seven more: T I α 1540 I, T I D (3 p.) a, T II K 11 (15 p.) n, and T II D 178 β, a together with T II D 178 IX b, f, and j. The last four are from the same page of the same manuscript. It was also possible to identify tentatively the verso of a tiny fragment, T II D 52 (23 p.) a, with the opening words of the canto. On this page there is the beginning of a title, namely 'n[. . ., and beneath this are the words 'ngd rwš[with a p in the margin beside them. On the recto page are the last words of another line of poetry, accompanied by another p. These should perhaps be assigned to Huwīdagmān; but unfortunately the fragment is too small to make even the identification of the verso page certain.

The third fragment with a title from A.R. I is M 518. This bears the words:

(R) nxw(y)[n hn]d'm (V) 'n[d rwšn'n]

The trace of the g on the verso page is faint, but the fragment can be assigned with certainty to Angad Rōšnān for the reason given above—namely that the whole of H. I is known in translation. The verses on M 518 do not overlap with any on the other fragments from this first canto, and Henning therefore gave the fragment the separate signature of A.R. Ia. To it he joined a bilingual fragment M 815, which gives a Sogdian translation beneath the Parthian original. M 518 contains, with a gap, fifteen verses, and there are thirty verses in the earlier group of fragments. Thus there is a total of forty-five extant verses from A.R. I.

The second canto of Angad Rōšnān is represented only by the fragment M 863, which has the title

(R) bdyg [hnd'm] (V) ['ngd r]wšn'n

This is the last fragment of the cycle which can be assigned to its place by the evidence of an adequately preserved title either on the fragment itself or on an associated piece.

With the cycle Huwīdagmān it is again convenient to begin with some of the first fragments to be made known, namely T II D 178 I–III, three complete sheets written in a difficult script, which were published by Lentz. Lentz, on evidence already described,[1] identified the last six verses on T II D 178 I with the beginning of the fifth canto. The first three verses belong therefore to the end of the fourth. Lentz assumed that this fragment was followed by T II D 178 II, III, and the more fragmentary IV with possibly a page missing between III and IV; and he published all these together.[1] The assumption seemed justifiable; the contents of II followed smoothly upon those of I, and though there was some abruptness in the transition between II and III, it nevertheless was reasonable to suppose that these three perfect sheets of one manuscript had been preserved lying on top of each other. Yet further research has proved this supposition wrong. As has already been said, T II D 178 is unusual in that it has only five verses to a page. If therefore the recto page of another fragment with the usual number of verses to a page (ten) contains verses in common with, e.g., those of the recto page of T II D 178 I, its verso will overlap, not with the verso of T II D 178 I, but with the recto of the following sheet of this manuscript, supposedly T II D 178 II. As it happened, Henning discovered a fragment whose recto page did coincide with the recto page of T II D 178 I. This was M 858 e, the order of whose pages is fixed by the presence of a complete marginal p on the verso page. The recto of M 858 e coincides with T II D 178 I R, but its verso has nothing in common with T II D 178 II R, as would have been the case had these two sheets been consecutive. Henning was able, moreover, to add a second fragment, M 895 a, whose recto could be identified with T II D 178 I V, but whose verso was independent of T II D 178 II V. Thus it was certain that at least one sheet was missing between T II D 178 I and II.

Later I found three fragments, T II K (5 p.) e, and T I D 16 (9 p.) c and g, of which the two latter are from the same page of the same manuscript as M 895 a. All three have verses in common with T II D 178 I R but not with T II D 178 II. Further, the recto sides of three other fragments, T II D 67 (12 p.) a, T I D 51 (9 p.) b, and T I D (12 p.) i, proved to have verses in common with the verso of M 858 e; but again their versos did not overlap with T II D 178 II, as would have been the case had only one sheet been missing between T II D 178 I and II. There was thus established a series of twenty verses (with lacunae) at the beginning of H. V, which did not include T II D 178 II.

Further, it was possible to identify lines from the verso of a fragment T I D (9 p.) g with the first lines on the recto page of T II D 178 III. T I D (9 p.) g is a mere scrap of manuscript; but enough remains of the line immediately preceding the first verse of T II D 178 III to show that it is not the same as the last line of T II D 178 II. Nor has the recto page of T I D (9 p.) g anything in common with T II D 178 II; so at least two sheets must be missing between T II D 178 II and III also, and the links between the assumed series are thus severed entirely.

There is, moreover, the space of a verse left blank on the verso of T I D (9 p.) g which shows that the first verse on T II D 178 III R is the beginning of a canto. This fact accords admirably with the contents of the verse itself, for in it the Saviour appears to the soul —a moment of climax. The lines run as follows:

> When I had said these words, with soul a-tremble,
> I beheld the Saviour as he shone before me.

One would readily assign this verse to the beginning of the sixth canto of Huwīdagmān but for the evidence of the Sogdian material. A page with the signature T II K contains the last five verses of the Sogdian translation of H. V, and the first verse of H. VI, together with its two opening Parthian words in Sogdian transcription, namely 'wm "wδyn, i.e. 'and while I . . .' Henning translates the Sogdian version of H. VI 1 as follows:

> While I thus wept, and shed tears upon the ground,
> I heard the voice of the beneficent king.

These words are clearly not a translation of T II D 178 III R 1, which cannot therefore be assigned to H. VI. There is, moreover, the difficulty that although the Sogdian is not a translation of the Parthian verse, it presents much the same situation. In both the soul in distress becomes aware of its Saviour. It would be possible to understand the apparent parallelism as a dramatic development; in H. VI the soul hears the voice of its Saviour, and in a later canto it sees the god himself. This is not very likely, however; and the possibility therefore arises that T II D 178 III does not belong to this cycle at all. This is a matter to which we must return later.

There is a small fragment, M 489 b, which has the title

(R) pnjwm hn[d'm] (V) [hwyd]gm'n

This is the only fragment from this canto with a title, and it has not been linked with any other piece. Henning gave it a separate signature, and it now stands as H. Vb.

Of the other cantos of Huwīdagmān, the first is known in its entirety in a Chinese translation, containing originally seventy-eight verses.[1] Three Parthian fragments with titles have survived, and it was through these that Henning succeeded in identifying the Chinese version.[2] Two, M 233 and M 625 b, bear the following words:

M 625 b (R) [nys]'r'd h(w)[yd]gm"[n]

Both contain the opening verses of the hymn-cycle. M 625 b is singular in having the verses written in interspaced groups of three lines. The third fragment, M 93 I, has the title

(R) nxwyn hnd'm (V) hwydgm'n

It does not overlap with any other fragment, but can be assigned to its exact place within the canto by means of the Chinese. I was able to identify the following additional fragments: M 603, which is from the same manuscript as M 780 and other fragments containing verses from A.R. I; T II D 167 (10 p.) a, and T II D 167 (10 p.) b, two fragments from successive pages of the same manuscript; T I D 27 (10 p.) e; T II D 79 (3 p.) b; T I D 51(+T I α 6 p.) a; and T I D 51 (5 p.) b. None of these small fragments has a title or is connected with a fragment with a title, and without the Chinese version it would be impossible to assign them even approximately.

Almost nothing is known of the second canto of Huwīdagmān except its title, which is preserved as follows on two sheets from Sogdian manuscripts:[3]

T II K 178 (R) δβtykw 'n(δ)(V)βr's
T II D 178 (R) δβtykw 'nδ(V)kr'yty p't[

The whole title can be reconstructed thus:

δβtykw 'nδ[m'y γwyδkm'n] [γnt']kkr'yty p'tβr's i.e. 'Second Limb (of) Huwīdagmān: The Punishment of Sinners'.

[1] One verse has been omitted by a copyist; see below, p. 77 n. 7.

[2] The identification was made difficult, however, by the obscurity and verbosity of the Chinese rendering.

[3] Henning's readings and reconstruction.

Traces only are preserved in Sogdian of the last verse of this canto and the first verse of H. III[1]—not enough for a reconstruction of the verses, but sufficient to be a check on Parthian fragments. No identification has been possible.

No other trace remains of H. III. H. IV is represented by the first three verses on T II D 178 I R, which are the final verses of this canto. H. VI survives more fully. The fragment M 93 is a double sheet, of which the second sheet, M 93 II, contains verses from the sixth canto, under the heading

(R) šhwm hnd['m] (V) [hwyd]gm'n

With it Henning linked the fragment T II D 57, which has the same title, perfectly preserved; and I later added M 289 a, which is from the same page of the same manuscript as M 93 II. These three fragments give, with lacunae, a series of twenty-two verses. The Sogdian translation shows that these are not from the beginning of the canto.[2] The group has the signature H. VIc in the final reconstruction.

Finally Henning discovered from its colophon that the fragment M 256 R contains the last three verses of Huwīdagmān, which are also found in M 855 R. Neither fragment has a title, so that the number of this last canto is unknown.

All the fragments discussed so far—with the exception of those belonging to H. I—were assigned to their places on the evidence either of a title or of a colophon. Other evidence exists, however, by which several more fragments can be assigned with a fair measure of certainty; this part of the reconstruction is my own.

There exists a group of small fragments which has proved of considerable importance for the reconstruction of Angad Rōšnān. This is the series T I α 1530–44. The fifteen fragments consist each of a small part from the centre of a double sheet; on each page is preserved either the first or last words (or parts of words) of from one to four verses. The scraps of manuscript are too small to add much to our knowledge of the text, but are of value for the allotting of other fragments, since it appears that most of them have been kept in their original order in relation to one another. This was shown by the identification of several of them with verses of

[2] See above, p. 31.

Angad Rōšnān. These identifications have been mentioned in the appropriate places above; but to make the matter clear a table of them is given here:

T I α 1540 I R	A.R. I 18–19	T I α 1540 II V	A.R. VII 33–35
V	„ „ 28–29	R	„ „ 23–24
		1539 II V	„ „ 14–15
		R	„ „ 4–5
		1538 II V	„ VI 67–69
		R	„ „ 57–59
		1537 II V	„ „ 48–49
		R	„ „ 38–39

It is evident from this that the double sheet 1540 originally enclosed other double sheets containing the end of the first canto, the beginning of the seventh, and the whole of the intervening cantos (i.e. the second to sixth). Unfortunately gaps at the beginning of Angad Rōšnān make it impossible to identify 1539 I–1537 I; but on the evidence of the other fragments these may be assigned to the early cantos of the cycle.

Even without the decisive textual evidence, there would be reason to think that the fragments 1540–1537 had lain on top of each other. All are of roughly the same size and shape; and deteriorations which are apparent in 1540 show, but less conspicuously, on each successive fragment. There is, for example, a hole in the centre of 1540; and holes similar but diminishing in size are found in each of the rest of the series. From the character of the fragments alone, therefore, one would be justified in assuming 1540 to have been an outer sheet, which had enclosed, and to a certain extent protected, the inner ones.

Moreover, the shape of the fragments suggests that not only 1539–1537, but also the unidentified 1536–1530 had all lain within 1540, thus forming a continuous series; for the minute stages of deterioration can be traced throughout the group. Fragment 1530 is the best preserved of all; and its two sheets are almost identical in outline, as would naturally be the case with an inmost double sheet, whose sides would lie directly against each other. In the next fragment, 1531, a tiny tear appears, which is larger in 1532–7, and leads to the loss of a corner in 1538, on which the traces of only two verses are preserved, instead of three as in 1530–7. This is the case also for 1539–40.

From this it follows that 1540 enclosed all the ten double sheets 1539–1530, comprising approximately 400 verses.[1] These ten sheets must have contained between them about six cantos (i.e. the first to seventh); and a rough measure is thus provided of sixty-six verses to a canto. The only canto from either cycle known in its entirety is H. I, in which there are seventy-eight verses.[2] The discrepancy between the figures is not great, and there is no need to question on this score the combined textual and material evidence.

We must now leave this series of fragments temporarily to reconsider T II D 178 III. The identification of this fragment with T I D (9 p.) g[3] had severed its connexion with T II D 178 II, which had in turn already been divorced from T II D 178 I. Thus both these important fragments were left in vacuo. Moreover, the manuscript to which they belong contains both hymn-cycles (as had been shown by the identification of seven fragments, T II D 178 β, α, VIa, VIIa, IXb, f, g, and j, with verses from Angad Rōšnān). The possibility was therefore present that T II D 178 II and III belonged to Angad Rōšnān rather than to Huwīdagmān. For T II D 178 III this was almost a probability, on account of the Sogdian translation of H. VI, which showed that the Saviour's coming was described in that cycle in terms different from those used in the opening verse of the fragment.[4] The matter was finally decided by the identification of verses on the verso page of T II D 178 III with others on the verso of T I α 1535 II. The verses on the recto page of 1535 II fall accordingly between those on the recto pages of T II D 178 III and its associated fragment T I D (9 p.) g, with both of which they agree perfectly.

T II D 178 III contains, as we have seen, the beginning of a canto. It follows that 1535 II contains verses close to the beginning of the same canto. By a curious chance, however, 1535 I also contains the opening of a canto, as is shown by a space left blank between two verses on its recto page. It remained, therefore, to discover if possible which cantos were thus represented.

Let us first consider the assignment of the group of verses made up by T I D (9 p.) g+1535 II+T II D 178 III. We have seen that the fragments 1530–40 form an unbroken series. Fragment 1537 II contains the first verses of a block of thirty-six from the end of A.R. VI.[1] Our rough calculation of sixty-six verses to a canto, together with the actual example of seventy-eight in H. I, suggests that cantos were of considerable length. At least one more fragment from the series must therefore be assigned to this sixth canto. The inclusion of 1536 II brings the number of verses in the canto to fifty-six; but since the preceding page, 1535 II V, contains verses from near the beginning of a canto, it is plain that these must be added also. Together with the verses on the recto page of the associated T II D 178 III, they bring the total for A.R. VI to seventy-three, a number which agrees well with the other evidence. We may therefore assign T II D 178 III with confidence to the beginning of A.R. VI.[2] A result of this is that in both cycles the Saviour appears at the beginning of the sixth canto—a piece of parallelism which provides further evidence for the correctness of the allocation.

[1] 1540 I R 1 = A.R. I 18, so that the sheet preceding 1540 I must have contained the opening verses of Angad Rōšnān. Possibly this missing sheet enclosed 1540 in its turn, making up a quire of twelve double sheets—a likely even number. The manuscript to which the fragments belonged may thus be compared with M 801, in which one double sheet originally enclosed at least fourteen others (see Henning, BBB., p. 5).

The double sheet 1535 enclosed, as we have seen, the double sheets 1534–1530. There were thus approximately 220 verses (viz. 5×40+20) between the canto beginning on 1535 I R and that beginning on 1535 II, a number which should comprise three cantos. Since 1535 II contains verses from the sixth canto, 1535 I should therefore contain the opening of the third. This accords well enough with the fact that 1535 I is preceded by the single sheets 1536 I–40 I, with 1540 I R 1 = A.R. I 18. These preceding sheets would then contain A.R. I and II, which would thus consist together of approximately 120 verses, i.e. roughly sixty verses to a canto. I have therefore assigned 1535 I to A.R. II and III; and have given T II D 178 III and its allied fragments the following signatures: T II D 178 III = A.R. VI; T I D (9 p.) g R+1535 II R = A.R. V.

According to these calculations the fragments 1534–1530 contain verses from cantos III–V. These fragments bear variously, on their left- or right-hand sheets, words such as kym . . . 'wm (i.e. 'Who [shall . . .] me, and . . . me'), which suggest verses from a part of the cycle preceding the coming of the Saviour. The Saviour is present in the sixth canto; and there is good reason, therefore, to be satisfied with a reconstruction which allots these fragments to cantos earlier than the sixth.

[1] See above, p. 26.

[2] Fragments from the same manuscript, namely T II D 178 VIa and VIIa, had already been identified with the verses now numbered A.R. VI 42–45, 47–50. Two sheets of manuscript are thus missing between them and T II D 178 III.

Few of the series T I α 1530–40 can be precisely assigned, since the exact number of verses in all cantos but the sixth is unknown; but approximate positions for the whole series are given in the following table:

A separate small fragment from a single page of the same manuscript, namely, T I D (12 p.) i, has been identified with verses from H. V. The manuscript is thus one of those which contained both hymn-cycles.

There are now two fragments with traces of titles to be considered. On one of them, T II D 75, the following words have survived:

(R) [ ] hnd'm (V) 'ngd rwšn'n

Since the fragment does not coincide with any other, the only evidence for supplying the missing number of the canto is in its contents. These consist of verses addressed by the Saviour to the soul. The fragment must, therefore, come after T II D 178 III (= A.R. VI 1–10) in which the Saviour first appears. Moreover, its contents resemble closely, both in matter and manner, the last verses on T II D 178 III and those at the beginning of the group of fragments first combined under the signature A.R. VI. It is a characteristic of both hymn-cycles to have long runs of verses of a similar type, and it is therefore probable that these three sets of verses form a single group. T II D 75 cannot well follow the group of fragments at the end of A.R. VI, for the beginning of A.R. VII is known, and contains matter of a different kind. It must therefore be set between it and T II D 178 III. The gap of twenty-seven verses which exists there is spanned by the fragment T I α 1536 II; but this contains only the beginning of lines on the recto page and the end of lines on the verso page, whereas the opposite is true of T II D 75. Even if the two fragments contained verses in common it would therefore be impossible to prove it. From the scanty traces on T I α 1536 II it seems unlikely, however, that they exactly coincide. The precise position of T II D 75 within the gap remains doubtful, therefore; but since for convenience of reference precision is desirable, I have identified T II D 75 R 1 with A.R. VI 21.[1] This is probably approximately correct, and as a result A.R. VI is almost complete.

The other fragment with a title is T II D 137[2], on whose recto page the one word šhwm has survived. To this fragment it was possible to join three others: T I D (5 p.) d, M 502 α, b, and T II D 167 (10 p.) j. The four fragments together give a run of twenty-four verses, with one considerable gap. The length of this series makes it impossible to assign it to the now almost complete A.R. VI, and we may therefore place it with confidence in H. VI. From its contents it is probable that the group precedes the verses already known from this canto; it has therefore been given the signature H. VIb.

The evidence for assigning the foregoing fragments is strong, although not so decisive as the existence of a full title. There remain several interesting fragments for whose assignment there are only slight indications; but an attempt has nevertheless been made to allot these to approximately correct positions. The tentative nature of their placing is shown by an asterisk before each signature.

One of these fragments is the complete page T II D 178 II.

[1] T II D 75 contains marginal p's, as do several fragments belonging to the later part of the canto; and their position shows that it is necessary to equate the first verse of the fragment with a verse of an odd number.

In connexion with this we must consider three more pieces from the manuscript T I α, numbered 1541–4. These pieces have the same general features as the series 1530–40, but are more tattered, and in one case the left- and right-hand sheets have become separated, and now bear different numbers (viz. 1543 and 1544). The connexion between these fragments and the series 1530–40 is obscure. Fragments 1542 I R and 1544 R each contain the words ky . . . kym . . . 'wm . . . which are characteristic of the early cantos of both cycles. But the series 1530–40 spans the whole of the early part of Angad Rōšnān up to the coming of the Saviour. Therefore either the fragments 1541–4 come from a different level of some of the same pages as 1530–40; or they are from a different set of pages altogether, presumably containing the other cycle Huwīdagmān. The fact that they are of roughly the same size and shape suggests that all fifteen were torn away in one block, which favours the latter interpretation. It is, moreover, known that the manuscript from which the fragments come contained both cycles. The fifteen fragments 1530–44 cannot, however, be consecutive, for wherever we assign the last three within Huwīdagmān, A.R. I 1–18 and all the verses of H. I at least are unrepresented.

It has not proved possible to identify any of these three fragments beyond a doubt; but there is a likelihood that T I α 1544 R = T II D 178 II R. The words preserved on 1544 R are as follows:

1a k[
b cy ʿy[
2a kym [ b cy [

The corresponding verses of T II D 178 II R run as follows:

3a kym bwj'ẖ 'c rwmb o cy hrwyn d'md'd'n
b cy ʿyw byd'n wyg'nynd o 'wṯ ʿst'wynd 'by 'xšd

4a k(ym) [p]rys(p)'n ʿzw'y'ẖ o 'wṯ p'rgyn wyd'r'ẖ
b cy pwr tr (s) 'w lrz o cy dyw'n wyg'ng

The correspondence is fairly striking in 1b = 3b, for the combination cy ʿy[ is not common. Nevertheless, since it is only possible to compare two verses, the evidence cannot be regarded as conclusive. (The verso pages do not correspond, since T II D 178 II has only five verses to a page.) There is, however, no other evidence for allotting T II D 178 II, which has therefore been placed within the cycle Huwīdagmān—very tentatively, since there are two doubtful factors: one, whether it and T I α 1544 are really to be identified, and two, whether in any case T I α 1544 really belongs to Huwīdagmān. As for the placing of T II D 178 II within the cycle, the only guide is the striking resemblance between its contents and those of T II D 178 I, formerly regarded as its predecessor. It has therefore been placed just before that fragment, with the signature H*. IVa. With T II D 178 II is associated also the small fragment T I D 8 (11 p.) b, one of whose pages coincides with verses on the verso page of T II D 178 II.

A fourth fragment from this same manuscript, namely T II D 178 IV, was published by Lentz as forming possibly the last member of the series I–IV; but there is no longer any reason to seek a close link between this and the fragments T II D 178 I–III. It is true that T II D 178 IV contains verses of the same character as its supposed predecessor; but the two sheets cannot be consecutive, for if they were the verso page of T II D 178 IV would overlap with the recto page of T I α 1536 II; and if only one sheet were missing between them it would be identifiable with the verso page of the same fragment. The remainder of A.R. VI is too well preserved for it to be possible that T II D 178 IV should belong later in that canto. Yet it is a striking fact that this fragment contains verses addressed by the Saviour to the soul, characterized by the same formula 'And I am . . . and you are' which distinguishes the early part of A.R. VI. Fortunately we know from the Sogdian translation that similar verses appear in Huwīdagmān also—another example of the close parallelism of the cycles.[1] This parallelism appears to extend in some degree to their structure. It seems probable, therefore, that since in Angad Rōšnān verses with this formula follow upon the appearance of the Saviour, the same was true of Huwīdagmān; and T II D 178 IV has therefore been allotted with some confidence to the opening part of the sixth canto of Huwīdagmān, with the signature H*. VIa.

Another interesting fragment is T II D 77[2] (5 p.) c, which has on its verso page a blank space between two verses, marking the end of a canto. The first seven verses of the fragment contain recollections of Paradise, at which the soul weeps. The last two, which are the opening ones of the new canto, are too fragmentary for their contents to be clear; but the words hrwyn wdng suggest that they contain some account of the soul's sufferings in this world. In the extant text recollections of Paradise are characteristic of Huwīdagmān. Apart from the descriptive first canto they occur also in the fragment H. Vb and in Sogdian verses from the fifth canto. The parallelism between the cycles makes it likely that similar passages occurred in Angad Rōšnān; but in the absence of positive proof of this we may regard Paradise and memories of it as a characteristic and recurrent theme in Huwīdagmān. Accordingly T II D 77[a] c has been allotted to this cycle. It is evident from its contents that the fragment contains verses from the early part of the cycle; and since there exist, in Parthian, Sogdian, or Chinese, the last verses of H. I, II, IV, and V, it can only be allotted to the end of the third canto and the beginning of the fourth. I have therefore given it the signatures H.* III and H.* IV.

Two other groups of fragments have been assigned almost arbitrarily. One is formed by the three fragments M 588, M 871 f, and T II D 66[r], which make up, with gaps, a series of twenty-three verses. The contents are partly narrative, partly dramatic, the latter consisting of words from the Saviour to the soul. In matter and manner they resemble closely the verses surviving from A.R. VIII. It was possible, therefore, to assign them either to this canto or to a parallel canto of Huwīdagmān. I have taken the latter course, and given the group the signature H.* VII. M 502 β, a, M 689, and T I D 51 (3 p.) b are three other small fragments whose contents overlap, and which also contain verses from the Saviour to the soul. M 689 is from a manuscript known to contain both cycles. On the grounds of congruence alone I have allotted these fragments to the end of Huwīdagmān, setting them immediately before the verses contained in M 256 R and M 855 R, which are known to be the last of the cycle. For reference it is necessary that this canto should be given a number; and since eight cantos are known for Angad Rōšnān, the last canto of Huwīdagmān has been called H.* VIII. It is, of course, in doubt whether eight is the correct total number of cantos. The group M 502 β, a+M 689+T I D 51 (3 p.) b bears, therefore, the signature H.* VIII; and M 256 R+M 855 R the signature H.* VIIIa.

Two other fragments assigned on the grounds of congruence alone are T I D (10 p.) j, and T I D (3 p.) b. The subject-matter of the former closely resembles that of the early verses of H. V. It has, therefore, been given the signature H.* Va. The latter is from the manuscript also represented by M 780 and other fragments, of which four contain verses from A.R. I. T I D (3 p.) b has verses closely resembling those of A.R. Ia, and it has therefore been given the signature A.R.* Ib. Finally there are several small fragments, connected by subject-matter alone, which have for convenience been assigned to A.R. III, with the surviving traces of which they are wholly in accord. These are T I D (12 p.) h (= A.R.* III a); T I D 51 α (2 p.) b+T I D 51 (+T I α (6 p.) ii) e (= A.R.* III b); and T II D 79 (3 p.) a (= A.R.* III c).

The reconstructed hymn-cycles are represented by the following number of Parthian verses:[1] Angad Rōšnān I (42 verses); II (6); III (18); V (2); VI (52); VII (50); and VIII (14). Total: 184. Huwīdagmān I (34); III (7); IV (16); V (20); VI (32); VII (13) and VIII (9). Total: 131. The total number of verses which have been assigned a place, definitely or tentatively, is thus 315.

There remains unidentified a considerable number of small fragments from strophic texts. From their contents it is evident that some of these are not to be connected with the hymn-cycles; the rest it was originally intended to reproduce in a group here. During their study, however, the difficulties of identification became increasingly apparent, and the usefulness of reproducing them in a block more and more doubtful. Some, moreover, are very small and lack any intrinsic value. The principle adopted in the end was therefore to reproduce only those which are of some interest in themselves, and whose connexion with the hymn-cycles is made probable either by their contents or by manuscript-evidence.[2] These appear together at the end under the heading Fragments.

VI. SOME REMARKS ON AUTHORSHIP AND STYLE

The two hymn-cycles resemble each other closely. There is a contrast in their opening cantos, but otherwise they are so alike both in matter and in style that passages from one have readily been assigned to the other, and runs of verses created out of the scattered fragments of both. From this we may infer that the two works are by one author; or that if they are by different authors, one has so directly inspired the other that we are justified in grouping them under one attribution.

[1] Fragments of verses have been generally counted in this reckoning provided they contain complete words, except for those verses represented only by the series T I α 1530–5, which have been omitted.

[2] Manuscript-evidence is not of great value, since one manuscript may have contained both the hymn-cycles and other poetic texts written in the same fashion, as, e.g., the manuscript represented by M 88+M 91, in which there were both Evangelionīg hymns and Angad Rōšnān.

The author of Huwīdagmān has been identified tentatively by Henning with Mār Ammō.[1] Slight internal evidence accords with this identification, since it favours the supposition of an early date. The hymn-cycles are in good Parthian; and they contain only a few of the Indian loan-words found in later texts.[2] Ammō, one of Mani's chief apostles, was chosen for the mission to the Parthians because of his knowledge of their language.[3] There is no other record, however, of his literary activity.[4]

In the handām hymns the author's purpose was presumably to celebrate death in a liturgy designed for general use. To achieve this worthily he has developed the theme of suffering and release through eight or more long cantos. This he has done without cumbering it with irrelevancies. There is an economy of allusion to secondary matters, but an expansive treatment of the main action. The absence of proper names is only one instance of a general restraint. Thus in the first canto of Huwīdagmān doctrinal details are subordinated to a broad description of the harmony of heaven, which the poet contrasts with the strife and misery of earth. Later the evils of earth are dealt with at even greater length through the soul's lamentations. The poet is deliberate and unhurried, achieving dignity and impressiveness by amplification rather than by concentration.

Diffuseness in handling requires an accompanying fullness of style. There is a difficulty here, however. The hymn-cycles are long, and were presumably sung, which meant they were apprehended by ear rather than eye. To 'load every rift with ore' would therefore be to strain the attention. Oral poets have met this difficulty through the use of traditional phrases and fixed epithets, which rest the attention and allow an ornate style that is not too exacting. The Parthian poet uses a simpler type of 'padding' which dilutes rather than enriches his style. His sentence-structure is simple. The sentences usually coincide with the half-verse or verse, and are thereby kept short and direct. A high proportion of them are introduced with the word 'and' (ud); and much use is made of a few colourless adjectives and pronouns, such as 'all' (harw, harwīn) and 'that, these' (hau, hawīn), which enable the author to construct runs of verses with a minimum of adjectival enrichment. Attention is thus concentrated on substantives and verbs. The poet uses also a number of stock phrases, frequently repeated: for example, 'and it is wholly full of . . .' (ud hamag purr . . .), 'and . . . there is none therein' (ud . . . andar nē ast). This means that often only one word in a half-line is fresh and significant.

Ammō was with Mani during the last days of his life, and testified concerning them to the Church (see Mir. Man. iii, p. 891 q 15–17 and n. 5 with references). He was remembered in popular tales in both East and West (see von Le Coq, Türk. Man. i, pp. 32–34, re-edited by Bang, Le Muséon, xliv, pp. 17–24; Polotsky, Man. Homilien, p. 91^{11} et seq.), and was later claimed as their founder by the schismatic Dēnāwars (see Mir. Man. iii, p. 854 n. 1 with references).

The attention is also rested by a considerable repetitiveness in vocabulary. This is to a certain extent inevitable when limited themes are handled at length; but it is clear that repetition in itself does not offend the author. He often repeats a word or phrase several times within a short run of verses, when he could easily have avoided such close juxtaposition. From this it seems that iteration is a deliberate device for emphasis.

Alliteration appears as a fairly frequent ornament. There is also a considerable use of imagery. The similes are obvious pictorial ones, whose effectiveness lies in their clarity; the movement of angels is compared with lightning, transient beauty with a rose or melting snow, wrath with a stormy sea. There is a much greater wealth of metaphor, which is drawn from the general Manichaean store of symbolism. To take one example, the world is variously presented as a sea and a waterless waste; a dungeon and a dark valley; a field of battle and a trap; a hell without light and a fire. The poet makes this imagery effective partly by its sheer abundance but partly also by imaginative use. The best preserved example of his skill occurs in the first canto of Angad Rōšnān. Sea-imagery is first introduced here by similes, one following the other in the usual leisurely and expansive fashion. The soul's sufferings are compared with a tossing sea, the demons' wrath with a sea of fire, the soul with something coursing over the heart of the ocean.

These incidental comparisons appear to lead the poet to the theme of the sea itself, which he takes up in a sustained metaphor. The furious waves, lashed by storm, seek to engulf the ship of the soul, which tosses with timbers strained, masts cracked, rudderless and adrift. The cumulative effect of the verses is impressive, and the image remains in the mind.

The hymn-cycles as a whole are planned works, and their subject-matter is firmly controlled; the action moves slowly but steadily, and there is an imaginative power which integrates the whole.

VII. VERSIFICATION

Many of the surviving verses of the hymn-cycles are mutilated; but there are 135 complete lines in Angad Rōšnān,[1] and 44 in Huwīdagmān, which provide a fair field for metrical study. Both cycles are written in the unrhymed,[2] accentual verse which Henning has shown to be characteristic of early Iranian poetry.[3] In this type of verse the number of stresses appears to be the decisive metrical factor; but Henning has observed that the variation in the number of syllables is not a matter of indifference, but appears to have its limits fixed for each poem.[4] A metrical comparison between the hymn-cycles must therefore take into consideration the length of lines as well as the number of stresses.

One of the difficulties in studying Middle Iranian verse is uncertainty over the pronunciation of some words.[5] This creates problems for a general study of metres, but fortunately does not affect a comparison between two particular poems of the same date, provided that a consistent scheme of pronunciation is adopted. In the case of the handām hymns any alterations in such a scheme would not result in changes in the relative lengths of the lines and half-lines of the two cycles; for a comparison between them can be based on a sufficiently large number of verses to ensure that any different pronunciations would merely cancel each other out. The assumed pronunciation is given below of some of the words that might be read in a different fashion:

[1] Now 139 (A.R. I 15a and 19b and VI 50a and 50b were restored after this metrical study had been completed). No lines are included in this estimate whose allocation is in any way doubtful.

[2] Rhyme appears so rarely in the hymn-cycles that it is probably an accident rather than a deliberate ornament.

[3] See Trans. Phil. Soc., 1942, pp. 52–56. Henning believes this Iranian poetry to have influenced the Mandaean, in which a similar type of verse is found. Lidzbarski had considered the possibility that the Mandaean verse-form was derived from a foreign source (see his introduction to Mandäische Liturgien, pp. viii–xv).

Monosyllables: bram-, brahm, drūšt, frēh, grāy-, grīw, gyān, radn, rōšn, syāw, wyāg, ᵘxad, zrēh.

Disyllables: a'i,[1] axšēnd, āžōn, əspāw, əzgad, burzwār, frəhīft, garān, maran, padgrift, paryāb-, šahrdār, wixas-, ᵘxēbē, yazdān, zanag.

Trisyllables: adyāwar, āwaržōg, əstāwišn, ciwāgōn, friyānag, hu-ārām, manuhmed, ramanīg, žamanīn.

The lengths of the complete lines in the two hymn-cycles are as follows:[2]

Thus in the cycle Angad Rōšnān there is a variation of eight in the minimum and maximum number of syllables, namely from eight to sixteen; and in Huwīdagmān a variation of seven, from ten to seventeen. Lines of nine syllables are well represented in Angad Rōšnān, but are absent from Huwīdagmān, as are lines of eight

[1] See Henning, BSOAS. xiii, p. 643 n. 9.

[2] A few of these lines have one or two letters restored; and one or two perfect lines have been omitted because they contain unknown words.

syllables. On the other hand, the line of seventeen syllables, relatively well represented in Huwīdagmān, is not found in the other cycle. A more detailed study of the relative length of the lines and half-lines in the two cycles is set out in the tables below:[1]

	Angad Rōšnān	Huwīdagmān
Lines counted	135	44
Number of syllables in these lines	1,531	564
Number of syllables in the first half-lines	741	288
Number of syllables in the second half-lines	790	276

The average length of the lines and half-lines is thus as follows:

	Angad Rōšnān	Huwīdagmān
Whole line	11·34	12·82
Half-line	5·67	6·41
First half-line	5·49	6·55
Second half-line	5·85	6·27

Thus there are small but definite differences between the cycles in the length of their lines. The average line in Huwīdagmān is longer by 13 per cent. than that in Angad Rōšnān. In the former cycle the first half-line is generally the longer; in the latter the second. If first half-lines only are compared, Huwīdagmān is on the average longer than Angad Rōšnān by 19·3 per cent.—in fact by slightly more than one whole syllable. The differences are slight, and only to be observed over a series of lines; but they are nevertheless significant, since they are consistently maintained throughout the considerable number of extant verses.

There is, however, a minority of lines which, taken by themselves, could belong to either cycle. It is therefore of interest to see whether there are any characteristic differences in the stress-patterns of the two cycles which would distinguish these lines of otherwise common character.[2]

A study of stress is attended by some difficulties, for the position of stress in Middle Iranian is not yet certain. Henning has adopted as a working hypothesis the principle of stress upon the final syllable within the word, which accords with later Western Iranian practice. The question of which words are to be stressed is often

[1] I am much indebted to Professor Henning for his kindness in helping me to prepare these tables and those on p. 58.

[2] When Henning drew attention to the fact that the limits of variation in the number of syllables are fixed for each poem, he pointed out that this suggests the existence of 'subtle differences in the structure of the verses'. See BSOAS. xiii, p. 645.

simplified by the fact that a poem with, apparently, three stresses to a line will contain many lines with only three words, or with three words and a conjunction or preposition.[1] In such cases it is simple to assign the stress.

Both the handām hymn-cycles appear to have four stresses to a line; and fortunately there are in each cycle a considerable number of half-lines containing only two words capable of taking the stress, such as the following examples:

A.R. I 3a	harwín wigānišn
H. I 1b	šahrdār kirbakkar
A.R. I 22b	ud wārān ud dūd
H. V 1b	ud aǰ dar tārīg

There are other lines where there could be a difference of opinion over the words to be stressed, as for example the following:

A.R. VI 50a	dast nē andāsād wasān
H. I 60a	ud ᵘxaš niwāg ramanīg

It is possible, however, to find in simpler half-lines patterns of stress which occur frequently; and tentatively to place the stress accordingly in more complex half-lines.

Each half-line is a separate metrical unit. This fact Henning was able to establish for a Pahlavi poem in which the first half of each line is filled by a recurrent formula.[2] In the handām hymns, similarly, half-lines are sometimes repeated in conjunction with others which differ in structure or length. The following are examples:

A.R. VII 6a	mas awar āsāh o pad šādīft abē zarīg
10a	mas awar āsāh o ud mā bawāh frēh
H. IVa 2b	zōnus razmāhīg o kū angōn nē ast
5b	ud aǰ harwīn warm o kū angōn nē ast
H. V 3b	ud hamag purr pad tār o ud nizmān dūdēn
A.R. I 14b	padīd ādur o ud nizmān dūdēn

Each half-line is therefore to be considered separately. In doing so I have labelled the four half-lines of a couplet aa and ab; ba and bb.

To compare the half-lines of the two cycles it is necessary to have some way of describing them metrically. For this purpose I have taken four basic patterns, A, B, C, and D, with numbered variants; and have used the symbols + for an unstressed syllable and / for a stressed syllable. The basic patterns are as follows:

A unstressed + stressed + unstressed + stressed.
B unstressed + stressed + unstressed + stressed + unstressed.
C unstressed + stressed + stressed + unstressed.
D stressed + unstressed + unstressed + stressed.

The unstressed syllables may be increased in each pattern, creating variants. In the following tables the complete half-lines of both cycles[1] are listed together for comparison under the appropriate patterns. Where possible a half-line from each cycle is given in each case as an example.

B

In this pattern there is an unstressed syllable (or two) after the second stressed syllable. It appears to be a general rule that an unstressed syllable (or syllables) occurs at the end of the line only if the second stressed syllable is the final syllable of a past participle, and if what follows is enclitic to the past participle.

There are finally a few half-lines in Angad Rōšnān which are outside this scheme, for they contain only one word capable of bearing a stress. We have therefore to infer either that occasionally one word bore two main stresses, or that a few lines had only three instead of four stresses. These half-lines are given below:

A.R.	I	27 ba	ud əstūnān
		29 aa	ud nāwāzān
	VI	51 ba	ud murgārīd
		63 ab	čē burzwār
	VIIa	14 aa	ud āgust a'i
	VIII	11 aa	ud əzwartēnd

In the following two examples wasnād presumably receives a stress, as in A.R. VI 61 aa (A 2), and 62 aa (A 9):

A.R.	I	21 ba	wasnād āšōb
	VI	57 aa	ud tau wasnād

No such half-lines are found in Huwīdagmān; but they occur in other poems which appear to have in general four stresses to a line.[1]

[1] See, e.g., M 763 (Henning, BSOAS. xiii, p. 646), in which 1 ab, 4 ba, 6 aa, ba, ab, bb, and 11 ba contain only one word which can be stressed.

In both hymn-cycles there are a number of lines whose two halves are of the same pattern. These are set out below, with illustrations from each cycle:

A.R. I 3 a harwīn wigānišn o aǰ man widārāh (A 6)

VI 43 a az au tau bōžān o aǰ harwīn abnās (A 2)

H. IVb 1 b ud pad hawān ud abnās o harw zāwarān wiganēnd (A 10)

VIc 11 b čē pad hau padmōǰēd šādīft o ud šahrdārīft dēdēm bandēd (A 5)

A.R. I 22 b (A 2); Ia 2 a (A 3), 3 a (A 9); VI 54 b (A 6), 63 b (A 2), 67 a (A 10); VII 3 a (A 1), 8 b (A 3), 11 b (A 3), 13 b (A 2), 18 a (A 2), 19 b (A 2), 35 b (A 2); VIIa 4 a (A 9), 11 a (A 2); VIII 12 a (A 7), 15 a (A 6).

H. IVb 2 a (A 9); V 2 a (A 9), 9 b (A 2); VIc 1 b (A 10), 3 a (A 10).

Only half-lines of A-pattern are thus combined; but several variants of the A-pattern, both short and long, are used together.

It occurs much more rarely that three out of the four lines in a verse are of the same pattern. There are only five instances of this:

A.R. I a 2 ud winawād harw karm o ud axtarān āyušt ud harw astārag o ᵘxēbē čamag waxrēd

VII 13 mas āsāh tū gyān o ud mā bawāh frēh žamanīn əšmār o ud kambīg rōǰān

VII 35 bas bawēnd sāgān o čē grīwān murdag pad maran dahmag o čē harwīn syāwīft

VIIa 11 [ud] bawāh šādzird o pad im rōž əzgām
[čē] absist yōbahr o ud harwīn tau audažan

H. VIc 1 az pad zōš əstānān o ud frawazān pad bāzur abar aǰ harw zāwarān o ud axšēndān wistambag

There is no instance, however, of a symmetrical verse consisting of four half-lines of the same pattern. Sometimes the two lines of a verse are of the same length, but this is the result of a combination of different patterns in each. These verses are given below, under the number of syllables contained in each of their equal lines:

Nine syllables:		A.R. I 29; VIII 14.
Ten	„	A.R. VI 54, 63; VII 13.
Eleven	„	A.R. VI 51, 57; VII 5, 14, 17; H. V 3.
Twelve	„	A.R. I 24; VI 64, 66; VII 21; VIIa 1; H. V 4; VIc 44.

These evenly balanced verses are not common; and it is a striking fact that in Angad Rōšnān only lines of from nine to twelve syllables are thus combined, and in Huwīdagmān only those of from eleven to twelve. Very heavy or very light verses are thus avoided in both cycles. On the other hand, very short and very long lines are sometimes combined in one verse, perhaps in order to compensate one for the other. The following example is the most striking:

A.R. VII 3	a	āsāh tū gyān o ud frāǰ čāmāh	4+4 = 8
	b	ud mā bawāh āwaržōg o abar kadag dižwārīft	7+7 = 14

In these other instances also the difference in length between the lines is marked:

A.R. VI 56	a	ud pad tau bast dēdēm o au harwīn dušmanīn	6+6 = 12
	b	ud būd āgas ud padixšāhād o pad žamanīn axšēndīft	9+7 = 16
	67a	ud əstānān pad zāwar o ud nigundān pad frəhīft	7+7 = 14
	b	ud wāyān au padišt o au wyāg āfrīdag	6+5 = 11
	69a	ud hau rōšnān mād o au tau nimāyān	5+5 = 10
	b	ud yāwēdān wišmanāh o pad əstāwādag šādīft	7+7 = 14
H. I	23a	garānīft ud ambāhag o nē ast pad hawīn tanbār	7+7 = 14
	b	ud wigān nē ahāz o pad harwīn handām	6+5 = 11
	IVb 1a	imīn frabadēnd o abar harwīn dēsmān	5+6 = 11
	b	ud pad hawān ud abnās o harw zāwarān wiganēnd	7+7 = 14
	VIc 13a	ud au harwīn dēnābarān o ud wiǰīdagān kirbakkarān	8+9 = 17
	b	padmōǰēd əstāwišn o ušān dēdēm bandēd	6+6 = 12

H. VIc 14a ud padixšāhēnd pad šādīft o čiwāgōn abar nām būd paštag 8+9 = 17

b ud anǰūgīft widārād o aǰ dast dušmanūn 7+5 = 12

There is no question, however, of regular compensation in syllables between the lines to produce a mean for the verse; for one finds also lines of nine syllables linked with ones of ten, and a line of seventeen syllables linked with one of fourteen (H. I 1).

This brief study shows that there is a very wide range of stress-patterns. In fact few combinations of stressed and unstressed syllables are excluded;[1] and the number and fluidity of the resulting patterns makes any general attempt at schematization of doubtful value. The purpose of this study was not, however, to evolve a scheme of general application, but to find a means of comparing two particular poems in detail. From this point of view also the value of the results is to a certain extent negative. The majority of the verse-patterns are common to both cycles, and in both cycles they are freely combined in the same ways. It is true that the heavier A-patterns, such as ++/++/, ++/+++/, +++/++/, are relatively commoner in Huwīdagmān than in Angad Rōšnān; but to say this is only to restate in a different way that the average line in Huwīdagmān is longer than that in Angad Rōšnān. There are, however, a few small but definite points of difference between the cycles. Lines of four syllables occur in both of them, although only rarely in Huwīdagmān; in Angad Rōšnān these lines usually have A1-pattern stress, but in Huwīdagmān this stress-pattern is unknown, and the four-syllabled lines have D-pattern stress. No lines with B-stress occur in Huwīdagmān, and no lines of C1-stress, which approximates to B-stress in that both have one or more unstressed syllables after the second stress. Finally there are no lines in Huwīdagmān which have only one word capable of taking the stress. Such lines, and those with B- and C1-stress, are fairly well represented in Angad Rōšnān.

To a certain extent these differences in stress-pattern coincide with the differences in the number of syllables. Thus several examples of A1-stress occur in lines of eight or nine syllables, which are in any case peculiar to Angad Rōšnān. But in more instances the A1-stress and B-stress occur in lines of ten, eleven, and twelve syllables, which could otherwise have been assigned to either cycle. The same is true of the half-lines with apparently a single stress. Thus the differences in stress-pattern increase the certainty with which one can tell a run of verses of Huwīdagmān from a run of verses of Angad Rōšnān; but there are still many individual lines which are not distinguished in any of the ways discovered by the above analysis.

This fact limits the usefulness of the metrical differences for the purpose of textual reconstruction; for few of the fragments whose allocation is doubtful have enough verses with complete lines for these differences to be apparent. The two fragments T II D 178 II and III both contain, however, a series of perfectly preserved verses.[1] They have been assigned, on various grounds, to different cycles; and it was therefore a matter of considerable interest subsequently to study their metres. T II D 178 II had been assigned to Huwīdagmān, T II D 178 III to Angad Rōšnān. A detailed study of the length of their lines yielded the following results:

Average length	T II D 178 II	T II D 178 III

Second half-line . .	6·15	5·67
Whole line . . .	12·40	10·88

The average length of the whole lines in each fragment is slightly shorter than that established as the average for each cycle as a whole; but the relative differences between the two fragments are roughly the same as the relative differences between the two cycles. Thus in T II D 178 II the first half-line is a little longer than the second; in T II D 178 III the second half-line is longer by a little more than the first. The first half-line of T II D 178 II is about a syllable longer than the first half-line of T II D 178 III; and the whole line of T II D 178 II is about a syllable and a half longer than the whole line of T II D 178 III. This is an interesting confirmation of the general distinctions discovered between the cycles.

Furthermore, the fragment T II D 178 III, assigned to Angad Rōšnān, contains two half-lines with A1-stress. These are as follows:

A.R. VI 2 aa + / + / um dīd dīdan

5 ba + / + / ud harw čihrag

[1] These two fragments have not been included in the material hitherto considered.

The second example is combined with a half-line of five syllables:

5 bb ud yud āwendag

The result is a line of nine syllables, which is of a type peculiar to Angad Rōšnān. There is, moreover, a line with C1-stress, which again is a stress-pattern unknown in Huwīdagmān:

A.R. VI 1 aa + ud + kad + imīn / wāxtum / +

Thus the metrical distinctions strongly reinforce each other, and confirm the allocation of the two fragments; and this in turn is a valuable confirmation of the soundness of the general scheme of differences between the two cycles.

THE TEXTS

THE TEXTS

MANY of the fragments reproduced below share a common signature, such as T I a or T I D. In his private collection of photographs Professor Henning has sought to differentiate these by numbers or other indications. Thus in his lettering 'T I D (3 p.) a' indicates a fragment which is one of three pieces with the signature T I D mounted together in the Berlin Academy. These additional indications are invaluable for reference, but result in a necessarily clumsy signature. For convenience, therefore, all fragments except those with the signature 'M+ a number' have been given new signatures here, consisting of letters of the alphabet. The fragments with 'M+ a number' are indicated in the text by the number alone. There follows a list of all the fragments here reproduced, under their original signatures (together with any additional indications of Professor Henning's)[1]; beside these are set their new signatures (if any); and their allotted positions either within one of the hymn-cycles or within the group of fragments at the end. H. = Huwīdagmān, A.R. = Angad Rōšnān, Fr. = Fragment. Both sets of signatures are in alphabetical (and numerical) order.

In the reproduction of the text the margin carries beside each line the signatures of all the fragments in which that line—or any part of it—is preserved, together with R or V by the signatures to indicate recto or verso page. The text is a highly composite one; but the number of fragments involved has made it impossible always to show, without an over-cumbersome apparatus, in exactly which fragment each word occurs; and even in places where fragments are few it has not seemed necessary to attempt this when the text presents no problems. But wherever interesting words or constructions, unusual spellings, or doubtful readings occur, an effort has been made to show clearly the precise nature of the manuscript evidence.

The following conventions and abbreviations are used in the reproduction of the texts:

(bcd) = damaged letters, or uncertain readings.
[bcd] = suggested restoration of missing letters.
(. . .) = visible, but illegible letters.
[. . .] = estimated number of missing letters.
[ ] = a lacuna of undetermined extent. When an entire half-line is missing, this is indicated by a series of dots. . . . .

In the translation parentheses are used for explanatory additional words. In the notes H. = Henning, L. = Lentz.

[1] The fragments bh and ef were identified, from among recently acquired material during printing. They are not mentioned in the introduction.

Huwīdagmān I

Begun (is) Huwīdagmān
First canto of Huwīdagmān[1]

1 (It was) fortunate for us that through thee we knew and accepted thy teachings. Beneficent Sovereign, show mercy to us.[2]

2 The Envoy of [the Father (?)[3]] heals spirits, gives joy [to all], and removes sorrows (?).

3 (Traces only are legible.)[4]

4 [Lofty and] limitless, where [Darkness never comes] . . .

(One verse missing)

6 [All] the monasteries [are magnificent,[5] and] the . . . dwelling places. For they are happy [in] the Light and know no pain.[6]

[1] A complete translation of this canto is preserved in the Chinese Hymnscroll (see Henning, BSOAS. xi, p. 217). In this the Parthian verses of two lines are rendered by Chinese ones of four, of which the second and fourth rhyme. Sometimes the sense of the original appears to have been altered slightly for the sake of the rhyme. The Chinese is itself obscure, and is considered by Dr. Waley to lack any poetic merit. The whole of this very difficult text was translated by Mr. Tsui Chi (see BSOAS. xi, pp. 199–208); and Dr. Waley has most kindly re-examined those verses for which the Parthian is now known. His elucidations are given here (in my words), with the indication (W.).

[2] Henning's translation (with minor changes); see op. cit., p. 218. The Chinese contains several Buddhist technical terms: i.e. the word rendered by Tsui Chi as 'of superior form' represents Skt. lakṣaṇa-; 'clear speeches' represents Skt. vikalpa-, and 'deeds' Skt. karman- (W.).

[3] Before the word for 'Father' the Chinese has a character, mêng, usually used as a surname, but occasionally as an adjective meaning 'dark(ened), obscure' (W.). Possibly this adjective renders the idea expressed elsewhere by Pa. ngwstg 'hidden' (see Henning, Trans. Phil. Soc., 1944, p. 113 n.1), although to equate mêng with ngwstg is evidently to force its meaning.

[4] The word rendered by Tsui Chi as 'worries and afflictions' in 3c represents Skt. kleśa- (W.).

[5] The word translated as 'solemn' by Tsui Chi is a taboo-substitute for one meaning 'adorned, magnificent' (W.).

[6] Henning's translation (loc. cit.) except for the words supplied. The phrase rendered by Tsui Chi as 'to say . . . is not true' (6d and passim) means rather that the situation is one which cannot logically exist. It occurs commonly in the Nirvāṇa and other Sūtras (W.).

22 Their verdant garlands never fade; they are wreathed brightly, in numberless colours.[6]

23 Heaviness and drooping do not exist in their bodies. Paralysis does not affect any of (their) limbs.[7]

24 Heavy sleep never overtakes their souls. Deceptive dreams and delusions[8] [are unknown among them].[9]

[1] The Chinese also has 'goes to' (mistranslated as 'lives' by Tsui Chi) (W.). The fourth line of the Chinese verse should be translated 'there is never a case of . . .' (not 'cause for') (W.).

[2] Henning's translation (loc. cit.).

[3] The fourth line of the Chinese should be translated 'to say one person attacks another is not true' (W.).

[4] The adjective for 'clothes' in the Chinese is ming (famous), which throughout the Chinese text is written for ming (light) (W.).

[5] Cf. M 178, 14–18 (see H., BSOAS. xii, p. 307).

[6] Henning's translation (loc. cit.). The literal translation of the Chinese is as follows:

'a) The flowery headdresses are halcyon-blue, wonderfully adorned,
b) shining on each other only fresh and never fading or falling,
c) [as Tsui Chi's translation]
d) wonderful colours, inexhaustible, not thinning or diminishing.' (W.)

[7] Henning's translation (loc. cit.) with minor changes. The word 'paralysis' has been used by Prof. Henning to render Pa. wyg'n in 23b; it has no connexion with the incorrect use of the same word by Tsui Chi to translate the Chinese rendering of 23a, which is literally 'Their hands and feet, limbs and joints have no impediment or blocking up' (W.). The last expression has little meaning in the context, and may have been used simply for the rhyme. The terms in 23c translated by Tsui Chi as 'active works of life and death' render Skt. saṃskṛta- and jarāmaraṇa- (W.).

[8] The Chinese word translated by Tsui Chi as 'whim' in 24c renders Skt. viparīta- 'topsy-turvy; perverse'. The third line of the Chinese verse runs literally 'already no dream-imaginings or delusions' (W.).

[1] The first line of the Chinese runs: 'The community of saints are always enlightened and with wonderful wisdom'. 'Wisdom' was written in the T'ang period with a character now used for 'kindness' (correctly translated by Waldschmidt; see W.–L. ii, p. 517 n. to 135b). In the second line there is an illegible character before the word 'forget'. The third and fourth run: 'of limitless worlds, the marks of all things, they see as if standing in front of a bright mirror' (W.).

[2] In the Chinese the second line is: 'pretending and deceit, emptiness, are naturally not theirs'. There is no word for 'affectation' (W.).

[3] The Chinese of 28 is as follows:
'a) The fire of hunger and the distress of heat
b) are all absent from the World of Light where happiness prevails,
c) for ever free from hunger and thirst, and from mutually injuring one another,
d) there also there are no salty, bitter waters.' (W.)

[4] The Chinese of 29 is as follows:
'a) The hundred rivers and seas and springs,
b) waters of life, all clear to the bottom, with a fragrance that is marvellous,
c) if you enter, you will not drift away and be drowned,
d) also (there are) no violent waters (i.e. floods) coming to cause destruction.' (W.)

[5] The Chinese also has lightning (rendered as thunderbolt by Tsui Chi) (W.).

[6] Henning's translation (loc. cit.).

[7] z'wr'n is used in the hymn-cycles exclusively for the dark powers. It is rendered here simply by the Chinese word for 'devils'.

The word-division is doubtful [3] Restoration suggested by H. [4] The first part of the (') alone is visible; a dot which perhaps belongs to a succeeding r appears over the gap which follows

35 . . . the trees (?) do not shake down . . . all the fruits.[1]

36 . . . decay (?) [does not exist in] their fruit.[2] [Within and] without [it is all full of brightness].

(One verse missing)

38 [All the gardens] give out fragrance, so that (?) . . . [Bricks and thorns are] never [found] among [them].

39 [The whole of that land] gleams and . . . revealed (?) amidst them[3] . . .

(Eight verses missing)

48 [Each who] ascends[4] up to their land, and [who has the Knowledge,[5] will praise] His manifestation, lauded and beneficent.[6]

49 None who is among . . . has [a dark shadow]. [All the bodies] and appearances upon that land (are) [radiant].

50 Their dominion[7] . . . The depth of that [land has no boundary].[8]

[1] Cf. M 178 30–33 (loc. cit.).

[2] The first line of the Chinese is: 'Bitter poison, the sour and the rough, . . .' The final character is very rare and of doubtful meaning (W.).

[3] The third line of the Chinese has either 'precious lands in layers' or 'precious lands of all kinds'. The left part of a character has been omitted (W.).

[4] The Chinese word which presumably renders the Parthian snyd (translated by Tsui Chi as 'has sprung') is used, e.g., of fountains leaping up. It sounds strange in this context (W.).

[5] i.e. each who possesses religious enlightenment; cf. M 741 10b (BSOAS. xiii, p. 913).

[6] i.e. that of the Father of Light.

[7] šahrdārīft is a natural restoration in the light of 50b, but is not supported by the Chinese version, in which the first two lines of this verse are concerned with the inhabitants and not the land. These lines have no logical connexion with the last two, however, and Dr. Waley thinks they may be misplaced. (It seems possible that the translator in some way confused 49b with 50a, for there is some repetition in his version.) The literal rendering of the Chinese for 49b is:

'c) all the characteristics of his body are unusual,
d) and whatever (grows) on the precious soil is always halcyon-blue.'

The first two lines of 50 are as in Tsui Chi's translation (but with 'magnificent' for 'solemn' in b). The last two lines run as follows:

'c) downwards penetrating the precious earth without boundary or limit,
d) wanting to know its limit would not make sense.' (W.)

'c) powerful and always peaceful and without decay or old age, d) one must say that they have no decrease, and their bodies are continually strong.' (W.)

[2] The literal translation of the Chinese is as follows:
'None but the great Holy One knows the measure of their bodies.
How could ordinary mortals calculate and speak it?
Their diamond bodies cannot be imagined.
The size of their conformations only the Holy One can distinguish.' (W.)

[3] Dr. Waley emends the second line of the Chinese by the small alteration of the character for 'impossible' to that for 'certainly'. The verse then runs as follows in a literal translation:
'Man and heaven and holy people and ordinary people—all their different varieties of form—
All other forms the carnal tongue can certainly describe.
The Buddhas are really difficult to imagine,
And the precious soil of diamond is just the same.' (W.)

[4] The fourth line of the Chinese verse is as follows: 'Their thoughts are all manifest and are all the same.' (W.)

[5] The second line of the Chinese verse is as follows: 'They perform marvellous chants without ever stopping.' (W.)

(End of the first canto)[8]

[1] The literal translation of the second line of the Chinese is: 'In antiphony their songs rise, recounting marvellous virtues' (W.).

[2] The Chinese word is that used in the sense of the Arabic salām in greetings (W.).

[3] i.e. the land of Paradise.

[4] The word in the second line of the Chinese which is rendered as 'criticism' by Tsui Chi may mean 'exile'; but the reading is doubtful (W.).

[5] The third line of the Chinese verse is literally 'esteem and joy have no gaps between' (W.).

[6] In the last line of this verse the Chinese has 'the Three Terminations', i.e. the three kinds of death (by sickness, violence, or old age) (W.).

[7] Although the Chinese version has only seventy-seven verses, in the superscription it is said to contain seventy-eight (see BSOAS. xi, p. 199). Presumably the translator has omitted a verse. This would account for a discrepancy between the texts; see p. 76 n. 7.

3 Never to eternity is there safety there. (It is) all full of darkness and fume-filled fog.

4 (It is) all full of wrath and there is no pity (?) there. All who enter are pierced by wounds.

5 (It is) waterless through drought, and hardened by hot winds. No golden[2] drop (of water) is ever (found) therein.

6 Who will save me from this, and from all stabs, and take me afar from all distress of hell?

(Two verses missing)

[1] Evidently an adverb; I consulted Prof. Henning, who writes: 'Andreas rejected Lentz' translation Ich wünsche dass and proposed "(it is) time that HE should save me . . ." Now that you rightly point out that the MSS. in fact have ky, almost certainly the interrogative pronoun here (as in the preceding and following verses), your view that 'g'm is an adverb should be accepted. In that case, 'g'm cannot well be the word for "time, period". That we have here a different word is moreover indicated by the Sogdian transliteration, "k'm, i.e. āgām; "time", however, was āγām, which the Sogdians would have spelt "γ'm; the Sogdian transliterations prove the existence of a difference in the Parthian development of OIr. intervocalic -k- (resulting in -g-) and -g- (resulting in -γ-); cf. e.g. mwrδk'n = mwrdg'n against "γδ = 'gd. As therefore 'g'm in this passage continues OIr. ākām+x, one may assume an ancient avyayībhāva compound ākāmam* "according to wish" ("as I desire"; the meaning probably equalled that of Av. vasō).'

[2] Probably a reference to the best kind of Persian water, the water called golden, which no one was allowed to drink, on pain of death, except the Persian king and his eldest son: Athenaeus ιβ, 9, p. 515a, cf. Brisson, De Regno Pers., ch. 83 (pp. 125 sqq. ed. Lederlin). (H.)

[1] There appears to be no record of a flag being used on a ship before the Middle Ages (see article 'Flag', Ency. Brit., 13th ed.). drfš cannot therefore here mean 'pennant'; nor are the other established meanings of the word ('brightness', 'statue', or 'awl') suitable. In this context (with hwyn nx'b) drfš is apparently a part of the ship which is repeatedly submerged. Henning therefore connects it with Arm. draušak 'hem, border, edge (of clothes)' (H.A.G. 147), and translates as 'sheer strake, wale'. [but for a subsequent suggestion by H., see glossary s.v.]

[2] H. suggests that 'mwšt may here be a copyist's mistake for 'mšt 'broken'.

[3] Var. 'were . . . in dread'.

[4] For swk'n see glossary. I am much indebted to Professor Henning for his brilliant readings and restorations here, which make it possible to understand this sea-image as a whole.

First canto of Angad Rōšnān

1 Through continual redemptions every band, link, and shutter (?) of the prison becomes weakened (?).

2 All the comets (?) quivered, and the stars were whirled about, and each of the planets turned awry its course.

3 The earth shook, my foundation beneath, and the height of the heavens sank down above.

4 All the rivers, the veins of my body, dried up at (their) source (?) in every way.

5 My spirit is . . . oppressed . . . stab.

(One verse missing)

[1] For the identification of A.R. I vv. 1–30 see above, pp. 28–29; for vv. 38–59 see above, pp. 33–37. A.R. Ia and *Ib may contain verses from within the series 38–59; but the traces of this series are too scanty for identification to be possible.

[1] In 815 the original Pa. verse preceded the Sogd. translation. The Sogdian only of vv. 7 and 12 is preserved; the Sogdian and Parthian of vv. 8 and 13

[2] The Sogd. version of 8 is as follows:

8a 'rt̲my myδyt̲ 'ty m'kyty (sic) o (pt)šm'r myms
b 't̲y st̲'ryty cxry o cn šw'(m)[ndy jyq' wβ'] (H.)

b βndy xwycq 'kt̲nd o 't̲yšn t̲'pyy sxwst̲ (H.)

[5] hwlqg 518 [6] jy(w)[..] 518; (jyw)[..] 815 [7] The Sogd. version of 13 is as follows:

b ['r]t̲[my s't̲] 'nδmyt̲ o 'ty py(š)yt̲ pt̲ysyr'nd (H.)

7[1] All my limbs have connexion no longer. When again they were broken, they reflected on existence.[2]

8 The reckoning of my[3] days and months is ended. Harm befell the course of the zodiac's wheel.

(Two verses missing)

11 The seal of my feet and the joints of my toes—each link of the life of my soul was loosed.

12 Each joint of my[3] hands and of my[3] fingers—each was loosed and its seal taken off.

13 All the gristly parts—their life (?) grew feeble. Cold became each one of my limbs.

14 My knees were fettered through fear, and strength was drawn out of each leg.

[1] The Sogdian is obscure, and I am much indebted to Professor Henning for allowing me to reproduce the above tentative translation.

[2] Presumably 'reflect on' = 'get (mentally) prepared for (the next) existence (through re-birth)'; cf. 'šm'r- = kalpita P 2, 626 (H.).

[3] 'my' is found in the Sogdian but not the Parthian.

Angad Rōšnān VI

Sixth canto of Angad Rōšnān

1 When I had said these words, with soul a-tremble,
I beheld the Saviour as he shone before me.

2 I beheld the sight of all the Helmsmen, who had descended with him to array my soul.

3 I lifted up my eyes toward that direction, and saw all deaths were hidden by the Envoy.

4 All ravages had become remote from me, and grievous sickness, and the anguish of their distress.

5 The sight of them was hidden, their darkness had fled away. All (was divine) nature, without peer.[1]

6 [There shone forth] Light, elating and lovely [and full] of gladness,[2] pervading all my mind.

[1] This translation of 5b was suggested by Professor Henning.
[2] Cf. Ps. Bk. 38[30].

Angad Rōšnān VII

Seventh canto of Angad Rōšnān

1 Come, spirit, fear no more! Death has fallen, and sickness fled away.

2 The term of troubled days is ended, its terror departed amid clouds of fire.

3 Come, spirit, step forth! Let there be no desire for the house of affliction,[1]

4 which is wholly destruction and the anguish of death.[2] Truly thou wast cast out from thy native abode.

5 And all the pangs thou hast suffered in hell thou hast undergone for this, in the outset and beginning.

6 Come yet nearer, in gladness without regret; lie not content in the dwelling of death.

[1] Cf. Ps. Bk. 70^{29-30}.
[2] Cf. ibid. 87^{1-2}.

[1] So (doubtfully) in 175 only [2] o t[175;](o t)n'ryn 91. In 91 r in the first line is usually followed by an ornamental dot, which can look like a small y; but in this word the reading -ryn, and not -rn, is almost certain [3] So in 175 only [4] 'wṯ 517 [5] So in 91; "jwwn 774 [6] pṯ 517 [7] (')w 517; omitted, 774 [8] So in 91 and 774 [9] So in 91 and 774; 'jynd 517 [10] So in 91 and 517; 'xšyyd 774 [11] So in 91 and 774 [12] So in 774 and ef; swh[91 [13] "s'ẖ 774 [14] 'wṯ 517, 774 [15] qfyd 91 [16] u 517, 774 [17] 'bdb dv [18] So in 774; qryšn 91 [19] 'sṯ dv [20] 'wṯ 774 [21] So in 91; wyzmyryd 774 [22] u 774 [23] So in 91; wdzyd 774 (evidently a mistake—H.) 7 Turn not back, nor regard the shapes[1] of the bodies, which lie (there)[2] in wretchedness, they and (their) fellows.

8 See, they return through every rebirth, through every agony and every choking (?) prison.

9 See, they are reborn among all (kinds of) creatures, and their voice is heard in burning sighs.

10 Come yet nearer, and be not fond of this beauty that perishes in all (its) varieties.

11 It falls and melts as snow in sunshine. There is no abiding for any fair form.

12 It withers and fades as a broken rose, that wilts in the sun, whose grace is destroyed.[3]

13 Yet come, thou spirit, and be not fond of the sum of hours and the fleeting days.

[1] The precise meaning of cyhr, cyhrg is often difficult to determine. Here 'nature' might accord better with the following verses, but would be awkward in v. 7 itself. tnb'ryn cyhrg probably refers to the forms of the five categories of creatures.

[2] i.e. on the earth.

[2] Cf. Keph., p. 106 [14–15].

[3] Possibly hell is here conceived as the 'treasure-house' of evil deeds, in contradistinction to Paradise, where good acts are stored up; on the latter conception see G. Widengren, The great Vohu Manah, pp. 84–86.

Seventh canto of Angad Rōšnān

1 They[4] will become the bricks (?) (which are) spoilt and smashed, which are not fit to go up to the keepers of the Building.[5]

2 They will fall into the deep and be devoured in death. They will clothe themselves in darkness, distress, and fire.

3 They will nevermore find one to pity them. None will open for them the gate of hell.

4 They will be seared with sorrow amid all the quakings. They will groan and shriek at (their) bondage for ever.

[2] h'mcyhrg has latterly been translated by Henning as 'homomorphic' (see Trans. Phil. Soc., 1944, p. 112 n. 1). Puech, while accepting this, has pointed out that the general gnostic tradition tempts one rather to translate 'consubstantial' (see Le Manichéisme, 1949, p. 155 n. 275). The present passage strongly supports the rendering 'homomorphic', however; the reference is presumably to sinners who have sunk below the level of man, and are reincarnated among the creatures whose forms pre-existed in hell. [cf. now Henning, Asia Major, III ii, p. 194 n. 54.]

[4] The verso of this fragment may contain the opening words of Angad Rōšnān; see above, p. 29. The letters on its recto page are found also on M 12a, but possibly not at the end of the line. They are in any case common (cf. H. Vb 1a), and no identification would be possible without more evidence

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON THE MANUSCRIPTS

A LIST is here appended of the fifteen handām manuscripts which are represented by more than one fragment. Those given in group I are known to have contained both hymn-cycles. A (p) after a signature indicates a manuscript in which the letter p appears in the outer margins; an asterisk marks one for which the outer margins are lacking in all extant fragments; and an unadorned signature shows a manuscript in which the device of the p was definitely not used.

I

A: 603, 780, 831, 859, T I D (3 p.)b [1890], c [1891], a [1892], T I D 51 [2600], T II D 140 [5930]—B: the eleven fragments with the signature T II D 178—C (p): 93, 175, 289a, 489a, 675, 689, 774, 858e, T II D 167 (10 p.)a [6130], b [6131], j [6139], T III D 280 [8285]—D: T I D (9 p.)g [2206], T I D (10 p.)j [2339], T I D 27 (10 p.)e [2306]—E: 287, 855, T I a [1223]—F: T I a (15 p.) [1530–1544]; T I D (12 p.)i [2458].

[Note: In addition, the single fragment M 256 contains verses from both hymn-cycles.]

Reviving Manichaeism with the Evil God Challenge

Zoheir Bagheri Noaparast

Abstract

In contemporary analytic philosophy of religion, the evil God challenge has been developed by several authors as a parody argument. Proponents of this challenge contend that, given the goods in our world, the hypothesis of an omnipotent, omniscient, omnimalevolent God or the Evil God is absurd. Similarly, they argue, we should conclude that the hypothesis of a good God is also absurd due to the evils present in our world. This paper argues that, with the aid of this challenge and other contemporary debates in the philosophy of religion, one can make the case that a reintroduction of Manichaeism into philosophy of religion is worthwhile. This argument will propose that, considering our total evidence, the Good-God and the Evil-God demonstrate a similar level of support. Additionally, under a reconstructed Manichaean hypothesis, good and evil are seen as mutually explanatory. Furthermore, the natural order can be understood within this framework. Therefore, the Manichaean hypothesis could serve as a viable alternative to monotheistic theism; it can account for the co-existence of good and evil and is compatible with the observed order in nature.

1. Introduction

Manichaeism originated in the third century CE with its founder Mani (216–274/7 CE). Growing to maturity under the Sasanian monarchs Ardashir I (r. 224–40) and Shapur I (r. 240–72), Mani styled his movement "the Religion of Light" and envisaged it as a universal faith (Baker-Brian 2011, p. 5). At the heart of Manichaean cosmology lies an original, eternal dualism: two co-eternal principles of Light (spirit, good) and Darkness (matter, evil) dwelling in perfect separation until Darkness, drawn by the radiance of Light, attacked and intermixed their substances in a cosmic conflict (Coyle 2009, p. xiv). Manichaean eschatology envisaged a climactic end-time when, through the Elect's ritual actions, as much Light as possible had been reclaimed; the material universe would then dissolve, with Darkness confined to its own realm—though a residue of Light would remain irretrievably bound, a testament to evil's persistence despite final victory (Baker-Brian 2011, p. 67). In this paper, setting aside the historical, liturgical, and soteriological features of ancient Manichaeism, I treat the Manichaean hypothesis (MH) strictly as a hypothesis that rivals theism in explaining order, good, and evil.

Manichaeism, as a dualist religion, gained significant followers, and Saint Augustine was once among the followers of Mani; however, he later criticized the dualism of Mani and defended Christian theism. While the explanatory power of good and evil in the world was initially among the attractions of Manichaeism for Augustine, he later thought that dualism is false, and instead, by adopting a privation theory of evil, one should abandon dualism and instead accept Christian theism:

> Therefore, whatsoever is, is good. Evil, then, the origin of which I had been seeking, has no substance at all; for if it were a substance, it would be good. For either it would be an incorruptible substance and so a supreme good, or a corruptible substance, which could not be corrupted unless it were good. I understood, therefore, and it was made clear to me that thou madest all things good, nor is there any substance at all not made by thee. And because all that thou madest is not equal, each by itself is good, and the sum of all of them is very good, for our God made all things very good. (Augustine 1927, Book VII, Chapter XII)

Any dualist theory claiming there is a separate origin for evil and good views the privation theory of evil as a challenge. Another challenge for dualists is explaining the apparent harmony and order in the universe. If our world is a battleground between good and evil, visualizing an orderly world becomes difficult. Some argue that while Manichaeism better explains the presence of evil, it fails to account for the universe's order. As Hume's Philo concludes in the dialogues, although Manichaeism offers a stronger explanation of good and evil than theories that posit a wholly good or wholly evil God, the universe's order suggests that a God or gods without a moral character might be more plausible:

> Here the Manichaean system occurs as a proper hypothesis to solve the difficulty: And no doubt, in some respects, it is very specious, and has more probability than the common hypothesis, by giving a plausible account of the strange mixture of good and ill, which appears in life. But if we consider, on the other hand, the perfect uniformity and agreement of the parts of the universe, we shall not discover in it any marks of the combat of a malevolent with a benevolent being. There is indeed an opposition of pains and pleasures in the feelings of sensible creatures: But are not all the operations of nature carried on by an opposition of principles, of hot and cold, moist and dry, light and heavy? The true conclusion is, that the original source of all things is entirely indifferent to all these principles, and has no more regard to good above ill than to heat above cold, or to drought above moisture, or to light above heavy. There may be four hypotheses framed concerning the first causes of the universe; that they are endowed with perfect goodness, that they have perfect malice, that they are opposite and have both goodness and malice, that they have neither goodness nor malice. Mixed phenomena can never prove the two former unmixed principles. And the uniformity and steadiness of general laws seem to oppose the third. The fourth, therefore, seems by far the most probable. (Hume 2007, p. 86)

This paper will follow Philo's argument that, when comparing theism and MH, the latter seems to be in a better position in explaining the mixture of good and evil in the world. However, it will also argue against Philo by showing that there are ways that MH can be compatible with the order in the world. To do this, MH will be contrasted with the good God hypothesis (GGH) and the evil God hypothesis (EGH). The paper will examine recent debates around the evil God challenge (EGC) and the problem of evil, suggesting that, given these discussions, MH and its rivalry with theism should be taken seriously. First, we will analyze how EGC can weaken the epistemic probability of GGH while strengthening the epistemic probability of MH. Although this analysis focuses on a posteriori reasoning, we will also explore whether MH might be further supported and become a competitor to GGH through a priori reasoning. To achieve this, we will consider plausible scenarios where MH can explain the apparent order in the universe.

2. Manichean Hypothesis and the Evil God Challenge

EGC has been introduced and defended by various authors (e.g., Cahn 1977; Millican 1989; Law 2010, 2019; Collins 2019). Proponents of this challenge argue that any argument put forth to prove that a good God (GG) exists, or at least make it reasonable to believe in GG, can also be utilized to prove the evil God (EG) or demonstrate that it is reasonable to accept the EG. This is not to assume that theists must concede the symmetry between GGH and EGH. There are, in fact, some theistic attempts at undermining the very idea of symmetry between GGH and EGH (see Lancaster-Thomas 2018). However, as defenders of EGC have shown, theodicies for the GG can be closely mirrored by proponents of EG, for example, soul-breaking reverse-theodicies (see Law 2019), and through these reverse theodicies, the proponents of EGC offer explanations of why good exists. This paper relies on approximate evidential symmetry, which is sufficient for our comparative evaluation.

Additionally, supporters of EGC assert that belief in EG is absurd, and considering the similarities between the two, proponents of GG should acknowledge that belief in GG is likewise absurd. The problem of evil holds a significant position among advocates of EGC. By parodying this problem, they have introduced what is now known as 'the problem of good': If there exists an omnipotent, omniscient, omnimalevolent God, then why is there so much good in our world? The problem of good serves as the primary reason why Stephen Law deems EGH absurd,

> Of course, few, if any, of us believe the evil-god hypothesis. Prima facie, not only is there little reason to suppose such a being exists, there is also overwhelming evidence against his existence. When presented with the evil-god hypothesis, most of us immediately dismiss it as absurd, typically because we consider the problem of good decisive. (Law 2010, p. 357)

> And yet almost everyone considers the suggestion that the universe is the creation of an Evil God absurd. Why? One of the most obvious reasons you might give for rejecting the Evil God hypothesis is that the universe contains far too much good for it to be the creation of such a malevolent deity. Why, for example, would an evil God create love, laughter, ice cream, and rainbows? These things, surely, constitute excellent evidence that there's no Evil God. There's not just good, but at least some gratuitous good, in the universe. (Law 2019, p. 7)

In the debates regarding EG, almost everyone considers EGH to be absurd. The disagreement lies in whether one can argue from the symmetry between EGH and GGH to establish the absurdity of GGH. A proponent of the MH can adopt two broad strategies. First, they can argue that GGH is not absurd, and given the epistemic symmetries between EGH and GGH, EGH is not absurd either. If it can be shown that neither EGH nor GGH is absurd, another step needs to be taken: to demonstrate that the coexistence of EG and GG is possible and not absurd. In contemporary debates on EGC, no one has been willing to argue for the non-absurdity of EG when posed as the single cause of the universe. As Lancaster-Thomas puts it, there are two ways to formulate EGC:

> What I call the weak Evil-god challenge claims that belief in the EGH and belief in the GGH are both similarly likely or reasonable positions to hold, so there seems to be no motivating reason to choose one over the other. On the other hand, what I call the strong Evil-god challenge maintains that the GGH should be rejected because it is absurd or incoherent (the strong Evil-god challenge from incoherence), or because if the EGH is true then so is the GGH, which is > a contradictory state of affairs, so both must be rejected (the strong Evil-god challenge from inconsistency). (Lancaster-Thomas 2020, p. 452)

Lancaster-Thomas argues that no one in contemporary debates on EGC has defended the weak challenge. However, MH can be viable even if EGH and GGH are absurd, both individually and separately. Recall that the absurdity of EGH stems from the problem of good, and the proponent of EGH parodied this to illustrate that GGH is absurd due to the problem of evil. If proponents of MH do not face issues of good or evil, then MH is not absurd, even if EGH and GGH are absurd on their own.

In probabilistic terms, Pr(H | E) is the probability of a hypothesis given all the evidence E. Page and Baker-Hytch (2020) formulate the EGC as follows:

(1) GG is approximately epistemically symmetrical to EG. [premise]
(2) If a hypothesis H1 is approximately epistemically symmetrical to another hypothesis H2, then Pr(H1 | E) ≈ Pr(H2 | E). [premise]
(3) Therefore, Pr(GG | E) ≈ Pr(EG | E). [from (1) and (2)]
(4) Pr(EG | E) is very low. [premise]
(5) Therefore, Pr(GG | E) is very low. [from (3) and (4)] (Page and Baker-Hytch 2020, pp. 489–90)

Following Page and Baker-Hytch, I consider the total evidence to include all relevant factors, encompassing both supporting evidence and counterevidence for each of GG and EG, along with background information and considerations of theoretical virtue. Page and Baker-Hytch present the Evil-God Challenge by arguing that, based on the evidence, the good-God hypothesis and the evil-God hypothesis are roughly equally probable. Additionally, when two hypotheses have similar evidence, our total evidence should lead us to regard them as equally probable. From these points, it follows that, given our evidence, the probability of a good God is approximately the same as that of an evil God. However, almost everyone considers the evil-God hypothesis to be very improbable in light of the world's goods. Therefore, by parity of reasoning, the good-God hypothesis should also be regarded as very improbable in light of the world's evils.

Now, let us consider MH, the view that both GG and EG coexist. While Pr(GG | E) and Pr(EG | E) may each be low individually, their joint probability Pr(GG ∧ EG | E) need not be as low as one would get by assuming independence, if the existence of one deity makes the other more likely, for example, in cases where good and evil are positively interdependent. By the multiplication rule of conditional probabilities,

Pr(GG ∧ EG | E) = Pr(GG | EG ∧ E) × Pr(EG | E)
If Pr(GG | EG ∧ E) ≈ 1 while Pr(EG | E) is low
Then
Pr(GG ∧ EG | E) ≈ Pr(EG | E)

While each hypothesis is unlikely in isolation, the probability of the joint hypothesis under MH can still be appreciably higher than the product Pr(GG | E)×Pr(EG | E) that one would obtain under an independence assumption, provided that Pr(GG | EG ∧ E) is substantially greater than Pr(GG | E).

As mentioned earlier, Augustine relied on privation theories of evil to counter MH. More recently, the same argument has been used to counter EGH. Whether the privation theory of evil is dead is open to debate (see Calder 2007; Marks 2025). Nevertheless, even theists who do not consider it dead recognize the challenges it faces. Marks (2025) contends that the privation theory of evil is a hard pill to swallow. He asserts that this theory is challenged when we try to explain natural evils such as disease and predation. Although there are well-known theistic strategies for explaining natural evil, such as Hick's claim that a law-like environment is needed for our moral formation (Hick 1978, p. 305) and Augustinian theodicies that assign natural evils to fallen angels (Plantinga 1974, pp. 191–92)

Marks argues that if natural evils are genuine, it implies that God creates them. However, if we regard them as illusory or justify them by appealing to a greater cosmic harmony, it contradicts our moral intuitions surrounding pain and suffering. This is indeed a hard pill to swallow: the theist must either accept that God is the author of natural evil or reject our moral intuitions about pain and suffering (Marks 2025, pp. 22–26). Additionally, the proponent of EGH can parody the privation theory of evil and propose a privation theory of good (see Collins 2024). Given the challenges EGH and GGH face with their respective privation theories, it seems more reasonable to assume that some goods and evils cannot be accounted for by privation theories. As a result, MH appears to provide a more reasonable account of good and evil than GGH and EGH.

3. Manichaeism and A Priori Plausibility

Michael Hickson states that Bayle thought Christian theism has no reasonable response to the problem of evil, whereas Manichaeism does, and so the Christian has to accept his religion based on faith. For Bayle, Manichaeism had a posteriori superiority, whereas theism enjoyed an a priori advantage over Manichaeism (Hickson 2013, p. 54). According to Bayle, Manichaeism has the feature of a good system because of its empirical strength:

> However, assuming the Manicheans do win the a posteriori debate, the overall result is not necessarily a stalemate, for Bayle has his Manichean claim that "the main feature of a good system is that it accounts for what experience teaches us." Thus, the problem of evil for Bayle is that the Manicheans can win what is arguably the more important of two kinds of debate over the origin of evil, and so, from the point of view of reason, the dualist hypothesis is at least as appealing as the monotheistic, and is perhaps more appealing. (Hickson 2013, p. 55)

If we accept that GGH possesses a priori plausibility, while struggling to account for our experiences, and conversely, that MH can explain our experiences but lacks a priori plausibility, it is reasonable to question our a priori reasoning in this context and identify our faults within it. MH, a hypothesis with high a posteriori plausibility that conflicts with our a priori reasoning, provides substantial reason to revise our a priori judgments. If we cling to our a priori reasoning and dismiss hypotheses that demonstrate high empirical plausibility, we risk stagnation in scientific progress. In this sense, a priori reasoning, particularly in the realm of science, is best understood as relative rather than absolute (see Friedman 2009). I adhere to Bayle's point methodologically, namely that empirical fit marks a hypothesis as a live rival; however, this does not by itself establish the truth of a hypothesis. Likewise, relying on Friedman's relativized a priori does not vindicate the soundness of MH. That said, some recent arguments claim that the a priori reasoning employed by supporters of GGH can also be parodied and used by proponents of EGH. Consequently, we observe ontological and cosmological arguments being parodied and utilized to support EGH. MH, however, struggles to parody these arguments since, within this framework, there are two sources (one for good and one for evil), and proposing a single source for the universe in this model may lead to the conclusion that neither the GG nor EG represents a deity with creative powers. Nonetheless, there are plausible scenarios in which we can envision a world coming into existence despite MH. First, let us clarify what we mean by EG and how this might lend a priori plausibility to MH.

4. EG and Order

Forrest distinguishes between two different conceptions of EG (which he refers to as anti-God), which is useful for our discussion. First, an EG who "creates so that creatures will suffer, because of the joy this suffering gives It. This may be contrasted with a different idea of anti-God, that of an evil being that seeks to destroy things of value out of hatred or envy. An omnipotent, omniscient being would not be envious. Moreover, destructive hatred cannot motivate creation." (Forrest 2012, p. 37). For these two reasons, Forrest argues that the second conception of EG is not tenable.

Additionally, following Morriston, we can agree that even if only one deceiving God exists, there is no reason to believe that he should systematically deceive us. As Morriston argues, EG does not imply that we should be systematically deceived. He may enjoy the errors and deceptions, such as those concerning the existence of a loving God who created the world. After all, if you are not deceived about your child's existence when she suffers or dies, you too will suffer greatly. Morriston concludes that for this reason, we shouldn't assume that EGH increases the likelihood of systematic deception (Morriston 2004, pp. 97–98). Still, none of these licenses the stronger claim that, if both EG and GG exist, neither would try to influence us. The point is that in a two-deity setting, we have no good reason to expect a stable, publicly detectable net pattern of influence traceable to either side. Even if GG has reason to involve himself in human affairs, such involvement need not be overt or continuous (Swinburne 2003, p. 50), and under rivalry any regular policy by one will be met by countermoves from the other. So rather than saying that EG is systematically harming us while GG is systematically rescuing us, it is better to say that whatever influence there will be, it is intermittent, domain-specific, and apt to cancel out overall.

In the case of Manichaeism, however, it might be different because GG and EG are competing, after all, and are at war. Then, it may be argued that although they may each sometimes act, since both have roughly equal power, neither succeeds in systematically influencing us. The proponent of MH has other options as well. He can either interpret the war between good and evil as a metaphor or some theological doctrine that needs interpretation. Nevertheless, even if taken literally, we can say that for an activity to count as battle or war, there needs to be some rules governing that activity so that we can distinguish it from other phenomena, such as pure chaos. It may be the case that human involvement in this cosmic battle is not significant, although it does influence us humans and involves us in it. Alternatively, we can find inspiration from 'deal-making theodicy' that argues that God has entered into an agreement with Satan so that Satan would be the king of this world and hence the evils in this world (see Lembke 2025). Likewise, the Manichean can argue that since neither of these Gods can finish the other one off, they may agree to create a world in which they can cooperate to create humans and bet on how humans will act and whether humans will ultimately choose good or bad. Another possibility inspired by Forrest's 'Rebel Angel Theodicy' can be developed. We can argue that EG and GG were responsible for different natural laws, and, for example, while one was responsible for evolution (natural selection), the other was responsible for other laws (Forrest 2024, p. 2). The proponent of GGH may retort that, despite our efforts to show the superiority of MH to GGH based on its explanatory powers of our experiences, we have neglected the order we perceive in the universe. Order is not merely a matter of a priori plausibility; rather, our experiences also indicate that there is order in the universe. Just as GGH needs to deal with the problem of evil and EGH needs to deal with the problem of good, MH needs to deal with the problem of order. In other words, how can one believe in two battling Gods, one evil and one good, if there is an apparent order in the universe? Here, we can offer a response inspired by the Satan hypothesis (SH). The SH suggests that God has given Satan and fallen angels free will, and the natural evils we see in this world are the result of their activities. An objection against the SH is that if SH is true, why isn't the world that bad? In response to this objection, Dunnington responds

> Or, the proponent of SH might point out that Satan himself could have good reasons for reigning in the extent of his destruction. After all, Satan's aim is to > thwart God's purposes for the redemption of human persons, and making his malevolent intent utterly transparent would only serve to better attune human persons to the cosmic war Satan and his cohorts are waging against God. Satan wants people to hate God, but pulling out all the stops in his campaign of destruction would only serve to turn human persons against Satan and toward God. (Dunnington 2018, p. 268)

The Manichean can argue that EG has valid reasons to refrain from total destruction. First, if there is to be a battle or war, there must be sufficient order and regulation in the world for such an activity to be recognized as a battle. Every battle requires a battlefield, which necessitates some level of order. Secondly, total destruction would render human life nearly impossible. EG must engage in destruction only to the extent that allows human life to be viable while also giving humans the impression that the world is genuinely orderly. If the world seems orderly, the likelihood of humans believing in the existence of a good God increases. Thus, when confronted with the evils produced by the evil God, humans might begin to doubt GG's existence due to the presence of evil, even in an otherwise orderly context. Therefore, EG has compelling reasons not to disrupt the order in the universe and may even collaborate with GG to foster an orderly universe[1].

5. Conclusions

In this paper, we began by outlining the distinctive dualistic framework of Manichaeism. Turning to the EGC, we illustrated how advocates of MH can undermine GGH by parodying the evidential problem of evil through a parallel "problem of good." By employing probabilistic reasoning, supporters of MH can argue that, although the probabilities of Pr(GG | E) and Pr(EG | E) seem low in isolation, their joint probability under MH may be significantly higher if the existence of one deity increases the likelihood of the other. This suggests that MH not only circumvents the absurdities attributed to either GGH or EGH but also potentially achieves greater a posteriori plausibility by accounting for the mixed moral phenomena we observe.

We then explored a priori considerations, engaging with Bayle's distinction between intuitive appeal and empirical strength. While Christian theism possesses strong a priori plausibility, its empirical account of evil encounters difficulties. In contrast, Manichaeism excels empirically but conflicts with entrenched a priori beliefs. Building on Friedman's concept of the relativized a priori, this paper argued that hypotheses demonstrating high a posteriori plausibility, such as Manichaeism, should prompt a revision of our a priori commitments instead of outright dismissal. In this context, consistent empirical success can serve as evidence to reexamine what we deem "intuitively" reasonable.

A longstanding objection is that a universe ruled by two warring deities would lack the coherent order we observe. To address this, we examined recent theodicies, such as rebel-angel and "deal-making", which show that an evil deity might restrain its destructive impulses for strategic purposes (e.g., to maintain a recognizable "battlefield") and that both deities could implicitly cooperate to preserve natural regularities. These adaptations illustrate that Manichaeism can accommodate both a distinct source for the existence of evil and the maintenance of cosmic order without introducing logical contradictions. Ultimately, by integrating the a posteriori advantages provided by the EGC with renewed a priori plausibility, and by resolving the order objection through contemporary theodicies, MH can plausibly emerge as a serious alternative to monotheistic theism. However, this should be considered as a first step in reintroducing MH to the philosophy of religion, and as such, it only serves as a conditional validity claim (under the stated assumptions discussed) and not a soundness claim.

Note

[1] By introducing SH in this section, it might be thought that SH might be better off than MH. Although a thorough comparison would require a paper-length engagement, a few reasons for finding MH preferable to SH will be offered. SH posits a GG plus a created malign agent, namely Satan, whose harmful activity GG permits for reasons like soul-making. MH instead posits two ultimate, opposed principles, GG and EG. Under SH, good comes straight from God, but evil needs an extra explanation; under MH, good and evil come straight from relevant sources. SH suggests the world's order should mostly reduce suffering except where Satan interferes, yet much pain comes from the same steady laws that enable flourishing (e.g., evolutionary predation and pandemics). MH predicts a stable mixture where both principles are in play and neither is decisively dominant, fitting the observed regularity of order in the world.

Coptic Answers to Manichaean Questions: The Erotapokritic Nature of the Kephalaia

Timothy Pettipiece
(Ottawa)

In spite of the fact that substantial portions of the Manichaean Kephalaia have been edited and published for over half a century,[1] its form and function have remained generally misunderstood. Since these initial publications, even some of the most influential scholars have succumbed to the temptation to regard the Kephalaia, contained in two Coptic codices, either as a record of Mani's actual discourses[2] and teachings,[3] or as a systematic[4] (albeit

[1] The Manichaean Kephalaia exist in two Coptic codices discovered near the Egyptian town of Medinet Madi in 1929. The first codex (Berlin codex P. 15 996 or Berlin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Teacher" (abbreviated 1Ke), while the second codex (Codex C or Dublin Kephalaia codex) is entitled "The Kephalaia of the Wisdom of My Lord Mani" (2Ke). For a recent account of the discovery of these manuscripts see J. Robinson, "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi: 1929-1989", in Studia Manichaica II: Internationaler Kongreß zum Manichäismus 6.-10. August 1989, St. Augustin/Bonn, ed. by G. Wiessner and H.-J. Klimkeit, Wiesbaden, 1989, pp. 19-62. Much of the Berlin Kephalaia codex was published by H.-J. Polotsky and A. Böhlig (Kephalaia (1) : 1. Hälfte [Lieferung 1-10]. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940), A. Böhlig (Kephalaia (1) : 2 Hälfte [Lieferung 11-12]. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1966), while the remainder is being published by W.-P. Funk (Kephalaia (1) : Zweite Hälfte [Lieferung 13-14]. Stuttgart : Kohlhammer, 1999; Kephalaia (1) : Zweite Hälfte [Lieferung 15-16], Stuttgart : Kohlhammer, 2000, and forthcoming). For a recent account of the characteristics, content, and reconstruction of the Kephalaia codices, see Funk "The Reconstruction of the Manichaean Kephalaia", in Emerging from Darkness: Studies in the Recovery of Manichaean Sources, ed. by P. Mirecki and J. Beduhn, Leiden, 1997, pp. 143-159. The Dublin Kephalaia codex is included in Giversen's 1987 facsimile edition, although it is not (to my knowledge) currently being edited.

secondary) presentation of the "main points" of Manichaean theology. In reality, however, the work is neither. It should not be seen as a record of the ipsissima verba of Mani himself, nor should it be viewed as a summa[5] of Manichaean theology. Instead, it can be more accurately described as representing the emergence or evolution of a scholastic, interpretive tradition, ostensibly rooted in an authoritative oral tradition analogous to those which led to the compilation of the Jewish Talmudic and Islamic Hadith traditions.

While the Kephalaia (literally the "Chapter-book")[6] may present itself as a record of Manichaean oral tradition based on Mani's dis-of Mani" (Manichaeism in the Roman Empire and Medieval China, Tübingen, p. 177). While the enthusiasm of scholars for finding the authentic voice of Mani in such a text is understandable, somewhat more unsettling is the way in which the Kephalaia, as a primary source for Manichaeism, is sometimes simply pillaged by scholars for proof-texts in support of particular readings and hypotheses, with little or no attention paid to the chapter context from which such references are taken.

[3] G. Widengren spoke about "Mani's teaching, as set down in the Kephalaia" (Mani and Manichaeism, trans. by C. Kessler, London, p. 69), while L. J. R. Ort characterized the Kephalaia as "a summary of Mani's doctrines based on his own writings" (Mani: A Religio-Historical Description of His Personality, Leiden, 1967, p. 23)

[4] Even M Tardieu, in spite of the incredible balance and control of his Que sais-je volume, seems to indulge in a slight excess of rhetoric when he characterizes the Kephalaia as "une véritable summa theologica du manichéisme" based on Mani's logia (Le manichéisme, Paris, 1981, pp. 66-67). Similarly, L. Koenen characterized the Kephalaia as a "dogmatic textbook" ("How Dualistic is Mani's Dualism?" Codex Manichaicus coloniensis : Atti de Secondo Simposio Internazionale. Cozenza, 1990, p. 3).

[5] In its existing form, it does not appear to be structured with the same degree of deliberation as other systematic theological treatises from the period, such as Origen's De principiis.

[6] W.-P. Funk has suggested that this would seem to be the best way to translate the title (personal communication), although common usage prevents us from going that far. Nevertheless, I cannot help wonder whether the intended title is Kephalaia of the Teacher or simply just The Teacher (or in the case of volume two — The Wisdom of My Lord Mani), although evidence from both the Coptic Homilies (18.6) and the Acta Archelai 62 would seem to support the traditional interpretation of the page headings. As for the identification of individual chapters in this study, I have opted for chapter instead of kephalaion, a technical term which, though correct, has no real benefit and tends to obscure the unique character of each textual unit.

courses to his inner circle,[7] it is essentially the product of later theological developments and elaborations that seek to respond to a wide array of specific questions, many of which appear to be rooted in ambiguities found in the Manichaean canon. Typically (although not always), a chapter opens with Mani being questioned by (or sometimes questioning) one or more of his disciples about a specific point of doctrine or interpretation. This means that one of the primary aims sought by the compilers of this massive work was clarity. While Mani is famous for having recorded his teaching in a series of self-consciously canonical writings intended to definitively replace all previous revelations, the questions that are asked by the disciples give the distinct impression that Mani left many "loose ends" that needed to be resolved.[8] Thus, the Kephalaia appears to be a deliberate attempt to deal with some of these issues within an artificially constructed context of Mani's "apostolic authority,"[9] since at the close of the Kephalaia's "prologue" Mani is depicted as extolling his disciples to record the wisdom he imparted to them (1Ke 9.5-6) — a strange command from someone who was supposed to have provided a definitive and unambiguous record of his revelation. In other words, if Mani had indeed clearly and definitively explained all the subtleties of his vision, then there should have been no need to create such an extensive corpus of secondary literature that seeks to address such a wide array of problems. We might even say that the Kephalaia constitutes a sort of addenda et corrigenda for Manichaean canonical tradition.

Still, in a more formal way, there are aspects of the Kephalaia that allow for its comparison with at least two genres of ancient literature. First, the fact that it exists as a collection of "chapters" (literally, Greek: κεφάλαια) on a variety of topics means that it could be compared to certain forms of ancient Capitaliteratur, which aimed at the collection of teachings from a spiritual teacher

[8] In fact, surviving fragments from Mani's writings do indicate that some of them, such as the Book of Mysteries, were largely incidental in nature, while others, such as the work(s) known to Titus of Bostra, Theodoret, and Severus seem to have been more generalized, with less attention paid to fixed structures and detail.

[9] Funk, "Reconstruction", p. 152.

for the purposes of meditation.[10] A classical example of such literature is Epictetus' Manual (Encheiridion), which is essentially a collection of discourse on miscellaneous topics not unlike those found in the Kephalaia, such as On friendship (2.22), On those who plead sickness (3.5), or What solitude is; and what a solitary person (3.13). During the Late Antique period, such literature became particularly popular among monks and ascetics,[11] so it is not inconceivable that ascetically minded Manichaeans would have been interested in producing a work of this kind. The use, however, of the Kephalaia as a source of meditative discourses would seem to have more to do with how it might have been read during later periods than how it was formed.

Technically, however, the first volume of the work is called Kephalaia of the Teacher, implying a somewhat more didactic purpose. As a result, the second, and more likely genre with which the text bears a somewhat closer resemblance, and which speaks more to its compositional origins, is the erotapokrisis, or "question-and-answer" literature, that became popular among Jewish and Christian exegetes during the first centuries of the Common Era. This genre, which Claudio Zamagni has described as "un genre très élastique," was a form of secondary literature used primarily for the exegesis and elucidation of canonical texts (be they Jewish, Christian, or pagan), although such works often contained apologetic, didactic, or polemical overtones.[12] In the most general terms, the erotapokrisis takes as its most basic form a three-part structure consisting of 1) preface/prologue, 2) questions and answers, and 3) postscript/colophon.[13] According to this basic set of criteria, the Kephalaia could be classified as part of the erotapokritic genre, especially if its primary aim was the explication of ambiguities found within canonical Manichaean tradition.[14] Now let us examine in some more detail how the Kephalaia conforms to these three basic criteria.

1. Preface / Prologue

Although its initial pages are badly damaged, the first volume of Manichaean Kephalaia begins with what Iain Gardner has called "a framing sequence" and "justification for the entire work,"[15] essentially what we might call an "introduction." This "introduction," in as much as we can decipher it in its current state, appears to outline the basic contours of the Manichaean myth, describing the initial separation of the light and dark natures and the consequences of their tragic conflict (1Ke 1-5). All these cosmogonic events are presented by Mani, who reminds the reader that he has in fact already described them in his "books of light": the Great Gospel, the Treasure of Life, the Treatise, the Book of Mysteries, the Writing for the Parthians, the Letters, and the Psalms and Prayers (1Ke 5.23-26). We are told that in these works, which came to constitute the central canon of Manichaean scriptures, "everything that has occurred and that will occur is written in them" (1Ke 5.27-28). This, however, encapsulates the basic contradiction of the Kephalaia as a whole. If, as Mani is thought to have claimed, he left a definitive record of his revelation in his own writings, why would a work as extensive as the Kephalaia be necessary? Conveniently, the "introduction" provides its own rational when Mani is made to claim that "the world" prevented him from writing all his wisdom down (1Ke 6.16-17). As a result, he enjoins his disciples to record

> "all my wisdom [...] the questions that you have asked me [...] and the explanations that I have made clear to you from time to time; the homilies, the lessons, that I have proclaimed with the teachers to the leaders, together with the elect and the catechumens and the ones that I have uttered to free men and free women [...] all of them, that I have proclaimed from time to time! They are not written. You must remember them and write them; gather > them in different places; because much is the wisdom that I have uttered to you." (1 Ke 6.18-27 [trans. Gardner])

Essentially the Kephalaia "introduction" attempts to legitimize a distinctly "oral" tradition of Manichaean discourse, parallel to Mani's written works, thereby justifying the collection of what we might think of as a sort of Manichaean Mishnah. The "introduction" then closes with an additional, albeit equally awkward, justification for the work as a whole. Repeating his well worn prophetological claim to be the "seal of the prophets", Mani is made to argue that since Jesus, Zoroaster, and Buddha neglected to leave any record of their teaching, the authenticity of their wisdom has been compromised (1Ke 7-8). This, however, begs a restatement of the earlier question: if, in fact, Mani did make a special effort to commit his wisdom to writing, why then encourage its elaboration in the form of the Kephalaia?

My own opinion, based on what we can glean from fragments of Mani's own works — which, ironically, for the most part have failed to survive — is that his writings were rather ambiguous and failed to provide a systematic presentation of what was, or at least came to be, an extremely complex mythological system. As a result, a primary aim of the compilers of the Kephalaia appears to have been the clarification of various aspects of the Manichaean myth which might have puzzled later adherents.

2. Questions and Answers

What then are some of the questions addressed by the many chapters of the Manichaean Kephalaia? While the vast majority of chapters deal with finer points of the myth, others address a range of prophetological, astrological, and even ecclesiological themes. My own research has demonstrated that the compilers of the Kephalaia made a special effort to adapt Manichaean discourse to their own preferred numerical frameworks, particularly pentads.[16] For example, on the mythological level, Kephalaia volume one addresses topics such as the creation of Adam (chapters 55, 57, 64), the works of the Third Messenger (chapters 34, 35, 46), the First Man (chapters 51, 53), the so-called "Five Fathers" (chapters 7, 25, 191, 148), and the Light-Mind (chapters 38, 102, 103, 126, 184), whereas astrological questions are asked about the nature of the sun (chapters 65, 123), the demonic influence of the zodiac (chapter 69), and the salvific force of the moon (chapters 145, 162). Ecclesiological questions about almsgiving (chapters 87, 144) and church hierarchy (chapters 88, 188) are also posed, as are some charmingly naïve questions about aspects of food, fire, and cloud.

In the Kephalaia of the Teacher, this vast array of questions is framed in a variety of more or less formulaic ways, with varying degrees of complexity, ranging from simple to compound questions. Some of the most common formulae introducing the questions include -"Disciples" question "him" (chs. 1, 2, 43, 49)

-"Disciples" question "the Enlightener" (chs. 14, 42, 56, 86, 113,
-"Disciples" question "the Apostle" (chs. 9, 10, 12, 38, 81, 82, 84, 85, 100, 101, 109, 116, 117)
-a "Catechumen" questions "the Enlightener" (chs. 57, 92), "the Apostle" (ch. 88) etc. (chs. 93, 99, 115)
-an "Elect" questions the "Apostle" (chs 90, 91, 102)

It remains to be seen whether a correlation can be found between these introductory formulae and the thematic content of their chapters. Nevertheless, an excellent, and quite elaborate, example of the first formula can be found in chapter 2, called "The Second, on the Parable of the Tree," which opens as follows:

> "The first parable they asked him about (and) implored [him to] interpret for them is this: While <crowds of […]> were gathered […] his disciples stood before him, asked him, saying: 'We implore you, our Lord, that you <teach us> and interpret for us these two trees <which Jesus> proclaimed to his disciples, as is written in the Gos<pel, where he said>: 'The good tree produces <good fruit,> and <the> evil tree produces bad fruit <[…] Neither is there a> good <tree> that produces bad fruit, <nor is there an evil tree that> produces good fruit.<Every tree is known by> its fruit'. <We> implore you, then, that you <now teach us about> these two trees <and> interpret them <for us> […] as they grow <on the> earth. For they are described […]<in the> writings […] them […] word(?) […] mystery by mystery. There are some among the Sects who interpret these two trees, counting them as good trees along with the rest of the good things on this mixed earth. Each <one(?)> […] to them, relating them to […] a single interpretation" (1Ke 16.35=17.20 [trans. mine]).

In this revealing passage, we can see Mani portrayed with his inner circle of disciples discussing a piece of canonical Christian scripture, for which the Apostle of Light provides a radically dualist exegesis. This accords very well with the basic exegetical function of question-and-answer literature as underlined by C. Zamagni.[17] Yet, as a cosmopolitan religious movement, Manichaean exegesis was not limited to specifically Christian traditions, as we can see in Chapter 57, where a so-called "Babylonian catechumen" questions Mani about a piece of Jewish apocryphal lore:

> "Again, a Babylonian catechumen questioned the Enlightener, saying to him: 'Speak to me, my lord, and clarify for me about Adam, the first man. When was he created, in what way was he formed, or in what way was he begotten? Does his generation resemble the generation which is begotten today among humankind, or else is there a distinction to be found between his birth and what happens today? [...] For, behold, Adam was strong in his substance, great was his size, (and) long were his years. He passed many years in the world. But he is not the only one that we have found to be strong, but also all the others who were begotten in his generation. Long were their years also. These people, however, who are begotten today, their substance diminishes (while) their power and the remainder of their years wane. Why, then, is the birth of those begotten today different than that of the first [...] in his very place. Behold also the stars and the zodiacal signs, they remain in their places. Why then has the life-span and the years of these latter ones diminished and gotten shorter than these ancients who are counted among this first generation?" (1Ke 144.15-145.4 [trans. mine]).

This phenomenon, Mani explains, is due to the fact that the people of Adam's generation possessed more light substance and thus more life-force, leading to longer life-spans.

Mani's exegetical skills are even applied to a piece of Persian tradition, when in Kephalaia Chapter 100, a disciple asks about how > "The laws of the Magi say that there is a dragon with fourteen heads holed up (in his) lair, in Five Hollows! Now, I implore you, my lord, that you open my eyes concerning this statement. Is there really a real dragon who has fourteen heads or is there, rather, a spiritual explanation?" (1Ke 252.1-7 [trans. mine]).

In contrast to what some have seen as Mani literalist tendency, he interprets this in a purely allegorical fashion as representing "the seven senses that are found on [the] head of the body, which are the two eyes with which it sees, the two ears with which it hears, the two nostrils with which it smells, as well as its tongue with which he selects and tastes the various flavours that are found in every form" (1Ke 252.19-24).

Occasionally, as in the case of the Babylonian catechumen, the questioner is identified in such a way as to imply an original or at least imagined socio-historical context for the chapter. For instance, in Chapter 89 a Jewish-Christian sectarian, identified as a "Nazorean" demands of Mani, "Your god, to whom you pray, as you believe in him, is he good or evil?" (1Ke 221). This example, along with the questions cited above, point to a highly contested sectarian context behind many of the discussions within the Kephalaia, most likely Syriac-speaking Mesopotamia — the original heartland of the Manichaean movement. If this is the case, then the use or adaptation of the question-and-answer form by sectarian groups from Syria could have occurred somewhat earlier than it did among their orthodox counterparts,[18] although it is equally possible that the Coptic Manichaean compilers simply shaped some received Mesopotamian material into an erotapokritic frame.

3. Conclusion

According to Wolf-Peter Funk's analysis of Kephalaia codex two, which, even though it contains continuous chapter numbers, is entitled Kephalaia of the Wisdom of my Lord Mani, the work as a whole ends with an "epilogue," a "final note," and a "colophon."[19] Unfortunately, these portions of the text remain, "officially" at least, unedited and shrouded in mystery. One thing we do know is this volume, which may come from a separate edition of the same work, appears far more Persian in its contents than volume one. Nevertheless, this limited information at least suggests that the Kephalaia conforms to the basic structure of an erotapokrisis.

It would appear then that the Manichaean Kephalaia conforms to the basic criteria of question-and-answer literature in that it contains an introduction, a series of questions and answers about aspects of a canonical tradition, and in all likelihood, a conclusion. In my opinion, looking at the Kephalaia in this light brings into much sharper focus not only of its function as a piece of religious literature but also its possible relations with similar texts from rival religious traditions.

At this point I must thank Yannis Papadogiannakis[20] for his very stimulating presentation on the erotapokriseis of Pseudo-Kaisarios. I was initially struck, on the basis of the index, by the fact that the range and variety of topics presented in this work is extremely similar to what we find in the Kephalaia, although coming (of course) from a very different theological perspective. Then, when I noticed buried in the apparatus that index claims to represent "the kephalaia (τῶν κεφαλαίον) of Kaisarios, brother of the holy Gregory the Theologian" I began to wonder about the possibility that perhaps the structure, content, and title of this Manichaean work is not so unusual after all. Perhaps it simply represents another instance of what Y. Papadogiannakis described as the constant reconfiguration of bodies of knowledge in Late Antiquity. In this case, we are faced with a group of Manichaeans struggling to make sense of their teacher's legacy and present it in a scholastic, even "scientific," form of questions and answers.

ABSTRACT – RÉSUMÉ

In terms of its genre, the Manichaean Kephalaia bears a close resemblance to the erotapokrisis, or "question-and-answer" literature that became popular among Jewish and Christian exegetes during the first centuries of the Common Era. This genre, which Claudio Zamagni has described as "un genre très élastique," was a form of secondary literature used primarily for the exegesis and elucidation of canonical texts (be they Jewish, Christian, or pagan), although such works often contained apologetic, didactic, or polemical overtones. In general, the erotapokrisis takes as its most basic form a three- part structure consisting of 1) preface/prologue, 2) questions and answers, and 3) postscript/colophon. According to this basic set of criteria, the Kephalaia could be classified as part of the erotapokritic genre, especially if its primary aim was the explication of ambiguities found within canonical Manichaean tradition.

Sous le rapport du genre, les Kephalaia manichéens ont une certaine ressemblance avec la littérature érotapocritique, ou la littérature par questions et réponses, qui devint populaire auprès des exégètes juifs et chrétiens dans les premiers siècles de notre ère. Ce genre, que Claudio Zamagni a décrit comme «un genre très élastique», était une forme de littérature dérivée, principalement utilisée pour l'exégèse et la clarification de textes canoniques (qu'ils soient juifs, chrétiens ou païens), bien que ces œuvres continssent souvent des accents apologétiques, didactiques ou polémiques. De manière générale, le genre érotapocritique se constitue, dans sa forme la plus simple, de trois parties: préface/prologue, questions et réponses, postface/colophon. Selon ces critères de base, les Kephalaia pourraient entre dans la catégorie des erotapokriseis, surtout si sa finalité première était l'explication des ambiguïtés dans la tradition canonique manichéenne.

Zaku,> [R/i] shepherd! O great (b) lamp, which was extinguished quickly! All grew black before (5) our eyes, weak and dull (?). O (g) hero, eager for the fight (10) and who left [his] army (behind)! Terror seized the army, the host was confounded. O great (d) tree, whose tall growth was shattered! Trembling took hold of the birds, whose nest (15) was destroyed. O great (x) sun, which has sunk out of the world! Dark did it grow for our eyes, for the light is veiled! (20) O (w) zealous leader of the caravan, who left his caravan. In deserts, waste places, mountains and chasms! O (z) heart and (25) soul which have gone from us! We have need of your skill, understanding and brilliance.

{ch.2} O (j) living (30) sea, [R/ii] which is dried out! The course of the rivers is held back, they cease to flow. O (h) green (5) hill, on which sheep graze! The milk for the lambs dried up, the sheep (10) bleat piteously. O (t̲) mighty father, whom many sons mourn! All the children, who have become (15) orphans! O (y) toiling lord, who bore hardship! He cared for the well-being of God's house in all things. O great (x) well, whose spring is stopped up! The sweet nourishment is kept from our mouths. O radiant (l) lamp, whose bright light shines over to another world! Over us came darkness.

the Four Sovereign Gods! Let us be saved from the four great sufferings! Those who have denied the Four Sovereign Gods, Those who have disparaged the doctrine of God, Those who have served the demons of Darkness, Those who have committed a myriad of errors. In the end, they will have just exactly that kind of dying. And that descending into darkest hell (described in the scripture): It says: demons by the ten thousands will come. It says: demons of the mist will crowd around them. It says: they will stifle and oppress them. It says: those who are suffocating them will attack them. It says: they will sit on their chests and beat them. It says: the souls of those who have denied (the Four Sovereign Gods) will go out (from their bodies). It says: they will abandon their bodies like dung. It says: their animate nature will come to a halt. It says: an old she-demon with disheveled hair will come. [It says:] she will have icy eyebrows like clouds full of hail. It says: her pupils (will be) like pots full of blood. It says: her long black nipples (will be) like stakes. It says: gray clouds will come out from her nose. It says: black smoke will come out from her throat. It says: her chest (will be composed of) all those innumerable snakes; her index finger (will be) that needle snake; her fingers (will be) all those [ ] mother of all demons, grew angry, and she stirred up great turmoil to aid her own soul. (ʾ) And from the impurity of the demons and from the filth of the she-demons she fashioned the body and entered into it herself. (p) Then she formed the good soul from the five Light Elements, the armour of the Lord Ohrmezd, and bound it within the body. She made him (c) as though blind and deaf, senseless and confused, so that he might not know his origin and his family. She (q) created the body as the prison, she fettered the miserable soul. (It cried out): 'The captors, the demons, she-demons and all the she-devils are cruel to me.' She (r) fettered the soul firmly to the accursed body; she filled it with hate and sin, anger and vengeance. {aq.3} Then Ohrmezd, the Lord, had mercy upon the souls. And he descended to the earth in the [form] of man. [R/ii] He (š) put to shame the evil (demoness); he made visible to him (Adam) and clearly showed him all that had been and that was to be. (t) Swiftly he revealed to him that the Lord Ohrmezd had not himself created the fleshly body and had not fettered the soul.

helmsman, the light nous stands ready to bring you across to the other side, (and/ so that) you may go in well-being to the light realm, may we also find peace beside you.’

{at.1} (’) ‘Welcome to you, light-soul. May you be greeted from your father, (b) {at.2} righteous god (bayγ), the highest of the gods (yazdān), whose diadem and glory (is) forever immortal!. Praise (15) to you, living soul! Holy, holy, god (bayγ) Lord Mani! (g) The blissful one of the lights was happy and rejoiced when you (the First Man) were born in the Realm (or to the rulership). (d) The twelve sons and airy aeons of the aeons (20) became happy. (h) All the gods (yazdān) and inhabitants of mountains, trees and springs, (w) of wide [V] firm palaces and tabernacles (or halls) are happy about you, friend. (z) The minds of lovely girls and maidens blossomed when they saw you. (5) (h) All of one voice in praise (they) praised you, youth without blemish.’ (t̲) Tambourine, harp and flute sounded the melodies of songs from all sides. (y) All the gods (yazdān) were before you, prince, son of the ruler. (x) Voices from the air sound, (10) the melody of songs from the light earth, when they say to the light father: ‘born is the pugnacious one who makes peace.’ {at.3} (l) For ever, oh best one, the highest of the gods (yazdān) has entrusted three tasks to you: (m) (i) that you destroy (15) death! (ii) That you kill the enemies! And (iii) conceal the whole light paradise. {at.4} (n) You made obeisance. And you went out to the [battle]. And you concealed the whole light paradise. (s) You bound the mighty prince (20) [forever], and you destroyed the abode of the dark ones. (‘) The friend of the light, the first man, was there until he accomplished the wish of the father sight is splendid, full of splendour then (?) (your) white sign, lofty your beautiful (15) banner which all the saved follow.

{bg 2} The seven climes of the whole world have been arranged, according to the course of the judge, in East, West, North, and South. Above in the sky the twelve gates have been opened each with leaves two by two, three by three having one (25) region each (?).The zone is exactly divided into twelve districts and lands, (with) their marches and frontiers, according to the course of the illuminator. The wise (30) helmsman passes on high through those six thresholds, he shines light [V/ii] upon earth through those twelve gates: three hundred and sixty dwellings with gates towards one (5) side, three hundred and sixty dwellings with gates towards the other side. In those thirty revolutions the palaces have been separately prepared, (10) the twelve hours and straight and curved (?) paths. Separately the forms appeared: frontier, [march, la]nd, threshold, gate, revolution, (15) hour, and dwelling. {bg 3} When first the illuminator shone, his course was in the North; for also the First Man had come to the battle-field (20) from there. The world, where he himself is, there there will be six hours (double hours?): three afterwards and three before, (25) so that the day there becomes two-fold (?) [...] he always runs from the North to the East, from the East to the South (30) and from the South

{bh 1} The pleasure of the world and the lust of appearance, and the things of the world are like unto sweet food mixed with poison: Hold back your soul from their trap! {bh 2} The beings that are deluded through the religions, are terrified. They find no going out (i.e. salvation) [...] and wisdom they do not know. Through blind habits they perish. Their nature has been turned into eternal bondage and ruin for them. They fall into hell after hell, from which they will not again find any way out (and) in which there is no peace or wellbeing. {bh 3} For us, Elect and Hearers, joy has been prepared, the palace, the throne and the garland for ever and ever. Even the Hearers become immortal. {bh 4} Have mercy, Beneficent God, on me, the grateful [... the smallest one of (your) sons and the faithful one; for I pray night and day. Lead my soul to the Eternal Paradies! {bj 1} Your Light I will give praise, Second Greatness, God Narisaf. Lovely apparition, brilliance […] judge and witness of all […] thousand-eyed great Light […] wise, where you sat down […] and may the Light s[hine … With you lives the Mother] [V] of the Righteous; near you is also the Living Spirit; (near you are) the mighty Fathers who gather pearls, the light leaders of the two great Lamps. There is a spring of peace where the gods dwell. They move the world and shine out splendour. Entirely full of joy (are) the divine dwelling places, the noble ships, the spiritual vessels. {bj 2} The overwhelming Powers, the giants, battle-stirrers, take away the Light from all creatures. They (i.e., the emanations of the Third Messenger) seduce the demons

{Hymn 2} {bl.1} (ʾ) Blessed among days (be) this day, when the Son of God descended to the earth. (15) (p) On this day the assembly of the apostles - blessed be for ever and ever the Great Father who was sent to us - gave us the new book of the free (g) souls (?)[...]

{bl.2} (t) Strive, you Hearers, increasingly add (n) more piety so that you too shall come to the resting place of the gods and become joyful in the (5) New Paradise – Kulamagāyadn.

{Hymn 3} {bm.1} (ʾ) Blessed (b) be the (g) shepherd, the (d) judge, the (h) well-ruling one (?), the (w) leader, the (z) powerful one, the (j) life. Blessed (10) be the eternal dominion, the (h) fortunate divine (x) lord of the strong, the (m) permanent (l)world-ruler of the (n) brave (s) chieftains; to the (t) throne of the (15) (r) righteous (š) sovereign of the pure intelligent powerful apostles we (n) pay homage. (n) We bend our knee, we sing to your glory, God Narisaf, Sovereign of the Light.

[...] you are [...] eternal realm. Lead me [...] to my own family. {bn 1} (h) Fortunate (?) every man who (5) in purity and truth recognizes, O God, your skill, manliness and miraculous power. I will take pains and be patient; I will keep zeal by day and (10) by night in order to complete, O God, your advice and order. Worldly pleasure and the things of the world, that Az (Greed) has prepared with activity and much trickery, I have abandoned at your (15) advice. Hear, O God, my praise and quickly receive my worship and my prayer. Lead me up from this poisonous depth! This (20) is the road, this is the secret, this is the great commandment and the gate of salvation.

Praise to the God Narisaf, bring praise with one accord. We would bring praise to his glory. We would become (of) one spirit (with him). We would truly adore this sovereign, the beneficent Father. The desire of (5) souls, (their) power and zeal. {bo.2} We would praise him and venerate the Great One, the blessed Father, the beauty of Light in which there is no flaw. The loverly, sweet form that is full of joy. It is (10) the Lord who [illuminates?] all regions […] and who causes bright life to shine over all {bu.1} We fill our eyes with praise and open our mouths with supplication (35) and honour and greatness to thee, Jesus the Splendour, [V/ii] redeemed King and New Aeon, let us give. Thou art, thou art the garment of blessing. Thou art the dearest brother. (5) Come for salvation, thou who art complete salvation! Come for piety, who art complete piety. Come for love, who art (10) complete love. Come as healer, who art complete healing. Come for peace, who art complete peace. (15) Come for life, who art complete life. Come as victor, who art complete victory. Come as a ruler, who art complete rulerhip. (20) Come for soul redemption, who art complete soul redemption.

{bu.3} Welcome, new lord and new physician! Welcome, (25) new redeemer (and) new redeemed one! Welcome, new god, noble radiance and great Light! Welcome, first-born time (30) and new time! Welcome, day that is complete joy! Welcome, year that brings a good harvest! Welcome, (35) primeval one, and first first-born! Welcome, fair mediator and third {bx.1} For the sake of the Ancestor (or of Satan), the Elect were chosen by Jesus. He (Satan) wanted to let waves of fire break through and burn the whole world in the fire. The noble king (Jesus?) changed his garment (5) and appeared in power to Satan. Heaven and Earth then trembled, and Sammael fell into the depths. The true Interpreter had mercy on the light (10) which the enemies had devoured; he then raised it from the deep pit of death to that place of zeal from whichit had descended. {bx.2} Honour to Thee, Son of Greatness, who hast freed thy (15) righteous ones. Protect now the Teacher Mār Zaku, the great Guardian of thy bright flock.

{by.1} Wake up Brothers, Elect on this day salvation for the Souls (came); (20) in the month of Mihr the fourteenth, when into Parinirvana went [V] Jesus the Son of God. {by.2} Pay attention ye all Believers in God: when the time of accomplishment came, about the Son of Man the demons of wrath got to know and the Lord of evil doctrine (5) rose and (having become) an accomplice put on the garment of deception. There were agitated from above the twelve thrones; upon the creation below poison was poured, upon the Sons, and the Cup of Death (10) was prepared. The Jews, the servants of the Highest God, deception incited the slanderer fell (= Satan fell to earth) and consequently they fight against the Son of Man; evil is their plot, (15) witnesses they gather with falsehood, the accursed Satan, who always disturbed the Apostles, himself vexed the Flock of Christ. {cq.3} Presentation of the bishop to the teacher. To the tune: 'Most strong God'.
A new omen has come: abundance and an [auspicious sign] have been sent by (20) the gods, deities and messengers [...]

. powerful new bishop, a good son of Vahman. Be happy and blissful and flourish as a good omen, so that (5) the leader may receive ever new support. Bless, confer gifts upon and gather your 'Light Form' (the Living Self), so that it may flourish in blessedness and live eternally.

{cq.5} To the tune of 'New Peace and Trust'.
A new omen of joy has come as an auspicious sign to the teacher of Truth: (15) a new bishop of exalted name. Be blissful, Lord, together with the children of the Church. And may the angels and spirits watch over you. [Live] in (20) peace. A new [(and) propitious] day has come [...] omen .

{Hymn 1} They say about the (r) souls that they shall not receive a form until they don a corpse and bodily form.

(5) {dg.1} The (š) worlds are amazed at the deceived idols, the images over the walls: wooden and stony.

{dg.2} They (t̲) fear (or stand in awe of ?) the deception. (10) They bend down and do homage to it. They have abandoned the father who (is) in paradise, and they worship the deception.
{Hymn 2} (a) And he donned my appearance, and I put to shame his teaching, and I laughed at him the tearing laughter of men.

(20) I made (b) perplexed and ashamed Adonai and his brats (asking): "If there is (only) one god, who deceived Gēhmurd (= Adam?) As for the (g) ruined šmbyd,[1] led astray and (25) lying, with broken skin: why do you paint the child of god on the šmbyd and (thus) make it born?

The (d) judgment (after) death has been set up for the bad in hell: why to Ahrimen and his sin did you assign the son of god(s)?

{dg.3} (h) Lo! Again, these two who worship the burning fire, they themselves know that from here their end is to the fire.

PREFACE

This volume provides an English translation, together with commentary, of the presently edited Coptic text of the Kephalaia; as established primarily by A. Böhlig and H.-J. Polotsky in the 1930's and early 1940's. This is but part of a single codex of the Medinet Madi library of Manichaean writings, the entirety of which codex is considerably greater than will be found here. The editorial process still continues. Work on a second Kephalaia codex from the same find has hardly begun. There is also Iranian kephalaic material. Thus I am conscious of the limitations of what is presented here as an entry into the fantastic worlds of Mani and his followers in their search for the God of truth.

My own fascination with this text began in the latter 1970's as I prepared for a doctoral dissertation on the Christology of Manichaeism at the University of Manchester. At that time I attempted rough translations both as a means to understand the doctrine, and as an exercise in the language. At the beginning of this present decade S.N.C. Lieu was kind enough to remember our struggles as graduate students, and wrote to me wondering if I would be willing to revise some of these drafts for a collaborative volume containing Manichaean texts from the Roman Empire. I somewhat arbitrarily set myself to the task of a hundred plus pages from the Kephalaia, but rapidly discarded my youthful exercises. Towards the completion of this initial stage Dr. Lieu introduced me to D. Montserrat with the suggestion that we might work together on the complete edited text, and Dr. Montserrat began to prepare drafts of chapters on which I had not yet worked.

In 1992 Dr. Montserrat visited me in Australia, and we enjoyed the opportunity to develop ideas for the volume and to work together on first drafts of difficult sections. Since then other commitments have forced Dominic to withdraw from the collaboration, but I take this opportunity to thank him for his many fine suggestions, and to acknowledge the occasions that his phrasing may have influenced the final version. Similarly I thank Samuel Lieu, and acknowledge that phrasing from collaborative work appears in the introductory material.

However, sole responsibility for the published text is my own.

Now, in 1994, I have again worked through every line. As each reading has brought more light, so I become more aware of the impossibility of the translator's task. However, it is apparent that the density and complexity of this text have proved a barrier to the study of Manichaeism, particularly in the anglophone world. My hope here is to have rendered more accessible the greatest and most detailed of the available primary sources, and thus to encourage future work that will in time supersede my own.

I thank Edith Cowan University for the use of resources and the help of many colleagues, in particular Peter Bedford with whom I have often discussed problems of the translation process. My Faculty was kind enough to grant me time release from teaching during the early part of the work, for which I am indeed grateful.

INTRODUCTION

Manichaeology and the Religion of Mani

The self-declared apostle Mani (216 – 276 c.e.) was a native of Babylonia who founded a world religion in the early years of the Sassanian Empire. He believed himself to be the recipient of direct revelation from his divine Twin Spirit, which being is understood to be the Paraclete foretold by Jesus, and with whom Mani became 'one body and one Spirit (K.15.23 – 24)'. Thus, in his Gospel and Epistles, he introduces himself as the apostle of Jesus Christ (e.g. CMC. p.66). In Greek and Coptic his name is Manichaios; that is 'Mani the living', as derived from his native Syriac.

Modern scholarship has devoted much attention to the question of the nature and characteristics of Mani's teachings, and of the religion that he founded; and this history of manichaeology may be read as a commentary on that of the discipline itself. For the Christian theologians and leaders of the past Manichaeism had been a dualistic heresy that threatened and attempted to subvert the truths revealed in scripture, as held secure and preached by the church. Thus the origins of the discipline, for western culture, are to be found in the Greek and Latin sources of that world; particularly in the disputations, anathemas and parodies of the bishops such as Augustine (once himself a believer but turned champion of orthodoxy) and Archelaus (the fabled victor over a hapless Mani) and Epiphanius (the acerbic cataloguer of errors).

When western scholarship began to free itself from the heritage of heresiology a new approach to sources, especially by orientalists in the latter nineteenth century with access to Syriac and Arabic authors such as Theodore bar Konai and an-Nadim who quote from Mani himself, gradually started to write a more objective history.

The twentieth century has brought a succession of dramatic textual finds that have repeatedly shifted the focus of attention. The first actual Manichaean writings discovered were in Iranian and Turkic and Chinese literatures, and were plundered from Central Asia by the great European expeditions at the start of this century. In the heyday of the 'History of Religions' as a discipline Manichaeism was reinvented as a Persian religion.

However, even since the 1920's scholarly attention has been repeatedly forced to focus on gnostic and Judaeo-Christian origins and traditions in Mani's teaching. Such are evidenced particularly by the Medinet Madi library from the 1930's, of which the Kephalaia is part; and then since 1969 the Cologne Mani Codex, which text recounts the genesis of Mani's own life and the community that he founded. Also the flood of scholarship occasioned by the Nag Hammadi library, that is the inaccurately but popularly named gnostic Gospels, has provided a context for the growth of manichaeology as its heir apparent.

Now, near the close of the twentieth century, the student of Manichaeism is presented with a striking array of sources evidencing a religion that spread from Mesopotamia throughout the late classical and Islamic worlds of the Mediterranean and west Asia, and across the Silk Road to finally flare and die in south China. Throughout this century the discipline has been preeminently the domain of specialists, necessitating a high degree of philological and technical skill, particularly such as is preserved in the elite institutions of the European continent. However, developments and projects by the academic community now in process seem certain to render the subject both more accessible and of broader interest. These include the activities of the International Association of Manichaean Studies, with its conferences and publications; and the various renewed efforts both to complete the editing of sources and to make them more available.

The latest and still continuing development in the story of Manichaean textual discoveries is part of this process. This is the uncovering of a fourth century Manichaean community and its texts at the late Roman site of Kellis in Egypt, by an Australian archaeological excavation directed by C. Hope on behalf of the Dakhleh Oasis Project. For the first time the social context of a Manichaean church from the early period, indeed of any so-called gnostic group of antiquity, can properly be recovered. Thus the subject becomes part of the documentary record of the late classical world.

Every discipline is a product of its own cultural framework and its time. Manichaeology at the turn of the millenium takes its place in the story of the deconstruction of received histories. The finds at Kellis evidence that the Manichaeans there regarded themselves as the true and holy church. This story subverts that of the inevitable triumph of, for want of a better phrase, catholic Christianity. Instead, Christianities in context are found to be diverse, subjects of law and economics and inter-personal relations. Doctrine is imposed and undermined, theological orthodoxy is seen to be a social construct.

What then is the meaning of the religion of Mani? The Mani Codex is a nascent gospel for the apostle that compiles written testimonies by some of his closest disciples, together with quotations from his own writings; and contextualised by excerpts from Paul and other authoritative apocalypses of the past. While hagiographical elements are already apparent, such as the tutelage of Mani by his Twin (σύζυγος) from youth, it does provide clear evidence of his upbringing in a Judaeo-Christian baptist community. Mani conflicts with the elders over the food and ritual practices of the group (on the perhaps revisionist grounds of actualised Manichaean praxis), and appeals to the teaching of their leader (and founder?) Alchasaios. Thus the community seems related to the Elchasaites of Christian sources, although it is notoriously difficult to disentangle the various teachings of such sects from the available texts.

In any case, it is apparent that Mani broke with the community, and the evolution of his teaching overlaid diverse elements from gnostic and Syriac Christian traditions upon the restricted world of his youth. The influence of Bardaisanite and Marcionite teachings is apparent, although in his scriptures Mani also enters into dispute with such. The adult Mani embarked on his career as healer and apostle, travelling throughout the Persian Empire and to India and the boundaries of Roman power. He seems to have been favourably received by the Sassanian King Shapur I, to have travelled in his entourage, and to have been welcomed in the courts of the aristocracy. Zarathustra and Buddha were incorporated into the tradition of true apostles, together with Jesus, although recent scholarship has tended to downplay the extent of Iranian and Indian influence on the essential structure of Mani's teachings. However, after the deaths of Shapur and his successor Hormizd, Mani was imprisoned by Vahram I probably under the influence of the chief mobed Kirder and the Zoroastrian hierarchy; and there received his own martyrdom. This was then followed by a general persecution of his followers, especially in Mesopotamia.

Since its liberation from heresiology the study of Manichaeism has been driven by philological experts and historians of religion. This has tended towards a dominating interest in the texts in themselves, and in the various strands of Manichaean teaching. However, Mani's vision and the worlds of his followers must also be comprehended as integrated wholes. Mani believed himself to be the recipient of, and owner of, truth.

> This is how everything th[at] has ha[pp]ened and that will happen was unveiled to me by the Paraclete; [...] everything the eye shall see, and the ear hear, and the thought think, a[n]d the [...] I have understood by him everything. I have seen the totality through him! (K. 14.19–23 and see CMC pp. 66-7)

For Mani truth can both be accessed and comprehended. Error attacks and mingles with it in history, but revelation from the eternal world illuminates the good, and offers the sure hope of final victory. Revealed truth is the same as that good that has always been present in the universe, which holds it together, proving life and coherence within death and disorder. Thus, on their own terms, Mani's teachings can not be regarded as eclectic. If his revelations accord with those of earlier apostles it is because they derive from the same source. Where they differ the prior apostolic teaching has been corrupted. Thus Mani reiterates and reveals Zarathustra, Buddha and Christ. Other Buddhisms or Christianities can only be dull reflections of this truth.

In his lifetime Mani devoted himself to the building up of the true church. The superficiality of religious terminology ('church') is important to an understanding of Manichaeism, for as a persecuted minority the community was accused of dissimulation and subversion. Mani wrote his inspired scriptures so that the truth could never again become corrupted by error. He sent out missionaries to east and west, and claimed that no previous revelation had been universal and thus final, as was the one that had been given to him.

From the late third century Manichaeism challenged the Christian hierarchy of the Mediterranean world; but with the triumph of catholic Christianity in the Roman empire, and the common interest of church and state, these western communities gradually failed and died under persecution. In west Asia Manichaeism remained a vibrant force well into the Abbasid era, and Arabic authors had access to the canonical scripures. However, the religion of light had its longest history in central and east Asia, perhaps surviving in south China until the early modern period. Despite the widely varied cultural forms in which it represented itself, Manichaeism retained an essential unity of vision and expression, and acted as an important conduit for the transmission of cultural ideas between east and west[1].

Manichaeism in Egypt

Manichaean missionaries would have first arrived in Egypt about 260 c.e. By the end of the third century the religion had attracted enough attention to be condemned by both the state, which feared its Persian origins and regarded it as harmful to the fabric of society; and the ecclesiastical authorities, who were particularly shocked by Mani's claim to be the apostle of Jesus Christ, come to restore and renew the true church. Nevertheless, although fiercely combatted and persecuted, Manichaeism attracted a radical and often sophisticated following. The pagan neoplatonist Alexander of Lycopolis, who informs us that the first missionary to reach Egypt was Papos[2], wrote against the doctrine surprised at its attraction for his philosophical colleagues. The religion also spread further west to Roman North Africa, where the writings of Augustine are an eloquent reminder of its appeal in the latter fourth century.

Upper Egypt seems to have become a particularly fruitful area for the Manichaean mission, and Christian writers made frequent attacks upon it. It is highly possible that missionaries reached the Thebaid not only via Alexandria and along the Nile valley, but also directly by sea from Mesopotamia to the coast (Berenice). The region features in the mercantile travels of Scythianus, the proto-Manichaean of Christian polemics. The largest corpus of extant Manichaean texts, the Medinet Madi library including the Kephalaia, can perhaps be traced to this area according to dialect. Although Manichaean success in the Roman Empire peaked about 400 c.e., it seems probable that communities survived in areas such as this into the Islamic period.

The documentary texts from Kellis will provide much new detail about this process of Manichaean expansion in fourth century Egypt. It is apparent that the believers understood themselves to be the true and holy church. Presumably the mission to Kellis began as an outreach from an established centre such as Lycopolis. At Kellis there appears to have been significant success, for the documentary texts evidence Manichaeism integrated into the life of the community, and psalms have been found in two different parts of the site. Whether this success was an isolated instance, or more common across the Oasis is unknown. The Dakhleh Oasis is even today a relatively remote region, at the edge of habitation. The excavations at Kellis evidence that the pagan temple was still functioning at the beginning of the fourth century, and it seems reasonable to suppose that the process of Christianisation was less advanced here than in major centres. These features may have aided the Manichaean mission.

Certainly the discovery of bilingual glossaries of Manichaean phrases evidence the remarkable fact of translation from Syriac into Lycopolitan Coptic at Kellis. This, together with allusions to persecution in some of the letters sent to Kellis from the Nile valley, supports the hypothesis that the Oasis became a significant Manichaean centre and safe haven for the community. Unfortunately the archive as yet recovered breaks off at the end of the fourth century, and so the future of the community is unknown. Presumably the strengthening of ecclesiastical control, married to state power, means that Kellis would not long have remained immune from the attention of the authorities.

The finds from Kellis evidence a link between the use of Lycopolitan Coptic and Manichaeism. Dialect and text connect these finds to the Medinet Madi library, for the same psalm tradition is a feature of both finds. Minor textual variants indicate that the Kellis material predates that of Medinet Madi, and thus uncover some of the history of the latter codices. It becomes apparent that codices such as the Psalm Book and Kephalaia are constructed works in the process of evolution.

As regards the social context of Manichaeism: it was a highly literate and transportable religion that in its conscious universalism appealed to and indeed targetted educated elites. It spread along the trade routes and was regarded by the authorities as subversive. It also evidences a strong role for women who are remarkably visible in the documentary texts from Kellis, as in other Manichaean material such as the doxologies in the Psalm Book. The church was strongly structured, programmed for evangelical mission. It developed an elaborate network of what might today be termed safe houses and propaganda factories, for the writing of texts was part of the religious praxis. The letters from Kellis evidence a powerful concern for communication, full of news and greetings and introductions.

Success was founded on the two-fold structure of the community with the elect supported by the catechumens for the full-time service of God, and thus able constantly to travel and to build up the churches. Lay believers, that is catechumens or hearers, could engage in the every day life of family and business; while through their alms-giving they could ensure their eventual salvation. The actual divine work could then safely be left to the elect. Thus the religion, despite its powerful evangelical mission and other worldly focus, was well placed to become an integral part of the community. It is reasonable to presume that Manichaean communities were able to maintain themselves, in areas such as Upper Egypt, for a number of centuries; despite almost continual attack and sporadic enforced persecution.

The Medinet Madi Library

The sensational news of Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten, Originalschriften des Mani und seiner Schüler, announced in 1933 by C. Schmidt, H. Ibscher and H.J. Polotsky, marks a decisive turning point in the modern rediscovery of the religion. The cache seems to have come from a wooden chest in the ruins of an old house in Medinet Madi, to the south west of the Fayoum in Middle Egypt. The codices were already broken up before they reached the Cairo market, where they were first seen by the Danish egyptologist H.O. Lange in November 1929. However, it was C. Schmidt in 1930, while on his way to Palestine to collect manuscripts for the Prussian Academy, who was shown a codex entitled Kephalaia and made the connection with Manichaeism. By sheer coincidence Schmidt was in the process of checking the proofs of the late K. Holl's edition of Epiphanius' Panarion, and he remembered that among the books that Mani was alleged to have received from Scythianus was one with the same title. Further examination revealed the characteristic clause: 'Once more the enlightener speaks to his disciples ...'

News of the discovery was immediately communicated to A. Harnack in Germany; but, before adequate funds could arrive in Egypt for their purchase, part of the find was acquired by the Irish-American philanthropist and collector A. Chester Beatty. His famous collection of classical and biblical manuscripts was housed first in London, but after the second world war transferred to Dublin, where they remain. The rest of the codices were then purchased by Schmidt with financial aid from the Stuttgart publishing company Kohlhammer, and shipped to Berlin.

The entire collection comprised seven codices, four in Berlin and three in London (now Dublin). In Berlin were: the Kephalaia of the Teacher (a small part of this went to Vienna); the Epistles of Mani; the Acts, a history of Mani and the early community; and the Synaxeis of the Living Gospel, (this codex also contains an at present unidentified text). In London: the Psalm Book, together with an index; a collection of Homilies; and the Kephalaia of the Wisdom of my Lord Mani.

The Coptic texts themselves date from about 400 c.e., and are translations of Syriac originals which reach back to Mani himself (the Epistles), or to the first generations (as with the Homilies). They are written in a form (L4) of that dialect known as sub-Achmimic or Lycopolitan; and thus seem not to have originated in the Fayoum, but were carried perhaps by missionaries or believers fleeing persecution.

The conservation of the extremely fragile codices from Medinet Madi, both of London and Berlin, was entrusted to the renowned H. Ibscher; and the task of printing the editions consigned to Kohlhammer Verlag. A special Coptic font was cut to resemble as closely as possible the hand of the original. For the first ten years publication proceeded apace: in 1934 H.J. Polotsky's edition and German translation of 96 pages of Manichäische Homilien; in 1938 the latter 234 pages of A Manichaean Psalm-Book. Part II, with an English translation by C.R.C. Allberry; and fascicles of the Berlin Kephalaia by A. Böhlig and H.J. Polotsky reaching page 244 in 1940. Unfortunately the rise of National Socialism in Germany, and the advent of the second world war, heralded a number of tragedies. These included the departure from Germany of a number of the leading scholars due to the threat of anti-semitism; the death of Allberry; and the loss and probable destruction of some of the codices housed in the soviet sector of Berlin. Specifically the historical work (Acts) and the Epistles seem to have been removed, and now only portions of these codices remain.

Such events led effectively to an end of work on the Medinet Madi texts for over forty years. Admittedly, A. Böhlig published a further fascicle of the Kephalaia (pages 244 – 291) in 1966, but the material for this was largely prepared in 1943. However, the current outlook is much more positive. With the financial support of the Carlsberg foundation S. Giversen has published a facsimile edition of all the Dublin texts in four volumes: Kephalaia; Homilies and Varia; Psalm Book Part I; and II (Cahiers d'Orientalisme XIV-XVII, Geneva 1986, 1988). Meanwhile, a separate team under the direction of J. Robinson is working on the remaining texts from Berlin, the Kephalaia and Synaxeis codices, together with such leaves as remain of the Acts and Epistles. Another team directed by M. Krause is currently in the process of reediting part II of the Psalm Book, before turning to Part I; and S. Giversen is coordinating the reedition of the Homilies codex. Also, I. Gardner is editing the new Coptic literary texts from Kellis, and coordinating work on the rest of the Manichaean material there together with other members of the Dakhleh Oasis Project.

The Kephalaia of the Teacher

Two codices of Kephalaia (that is 'of the head', thus chapters or summaries) were found at Medinet Madi. Their titles differ slightly, the wording of the Dublin one indicating more explicitly that it is the work of a disciple. However, this may not be of any great significance; and the two codices could well belong together. Until a full edition is made, their relationship will remain unclear. Certainly all the work is apocryphal in terms of Mani's canon of scripture. Still, the reference to the Kephalaia in such an early work as The Sermon of the Great War (H.18.6) indicates that it belongs in essence to the first generation after the death of the apostle (late third century)[3].

[3] 'I am weeping for the Kephalaia'. A reference in the Acta Archelai evidences that the work was known of in Christian circles by the 340's at the latest (for dating see Lieu 1994: 46-47, 135-140).

Indeed, in the introductory section to the text there appears to be a justification from Mani himself:

> The world has not permitted me to write down [...] all of it; and if you, my children and my disciples, write all my wisdom [...] the questions that you have asked me [...] and the explanations that I have made clear to you from time to time; the homilies, the lessons, that I have proclaimed with the teachers to the leaders, together with the elect and the catechumens [...] all that I have proclaimed from time to time. They are not written. You must remember them and write them; gather them in different places; because much is the wisdom that I have uttered to you. [...] according to your capacity, and even as you may find strength; remember! And write a little something from the great wisdom that you have heard from me (K. 6.16–27 9.5–7).

In a sense this is curious since it was intrinsic to the Manichaean scheme of things that the messages of previous apostles had been adulterated because they themselves had not written their own canon, unlike Mani, and their disciples had then corrupted their words. Nevertheless, kephalaic material has also been found in Manichaean writings in the east, in Parthian and Chinese, and clearly became an important genre for the propagation of the religion.

The Berlin codex opens with a grand survey of Manichaean cosmogonic doctrine; a listing of the canon; and a justification for the text itself, as above. Chapter One then relates the advent and task of previous apostles, culminating in Mani's own call, and the revelation from the Paraclete (his Twin Spirit or Counterpart). However, whilst the earliest chapters might be supposed to evidence some coherent structure to the work, there rapidly follows perhaps two hundred more linked in the most tenuous fashion if at all. The work illustrates a fascination, presumably Mani's own, with all aspects of the natural world, with astrology and the worlds of gods and demons. All such are ordered into elaborate taxonomies, underpinned by the detail of Mani's revealed doctrine, in order to establish a highly structured and holistic understanding of the cosmos and universal history.

The chapters vary greatly in length, appearing to incorporate blocks of oral and perhaps written tradition from a variety of sources. In general they follow a standard pattern wherein a disciple (occasionally an opponent) asks a question of the apostle, the 'enlightener' (various epithets are used). Usually contextual or historical detail is missing. The body of the chapter is then taken up with a summary of doctrine on that particular question which convinces all listeners; and may then end with a prayer of praise for Mani and thanks for his revelation. Similar catechetical methods can be found in early Christian and Buddhist texts. Certainly an introductory knowledge of the broad sweep of Manichaean teaching, as provided below, will help before attempting the Kephalaia.

The translation offered here is from the edited Coptic text concluding with kephalaion 122 (K. 295.8)[4]. The original extent of the Berlin codex is difficult to ascertain. The last reported page is 501/502, but a fragment with the pagination 514 has been identified. This may indicate an original total of 22 quires (528 pages). W.-P. Funk is currently editing the latter part of the codex and reports that from K. 296 there can now only be traced records or remains of 139 further pages, some of these in early transcriptions by Polotsky and Böhlig. It thus appears that 70 pages are no longer extant, counting to K. 504 (21 quires)[5].

The total number of chapters in the Berlin codex can be calculated as approximately 210/220. Since the lowest number for a kephalaion yet noted in the Dublin codex is 221 (pl. 17), it seems probable that this is in some sense a second volume, despite some apparent variations in the terminology and structure of the work[6]. The facsimile edition contains 354 plates; but the original extent and order of the codex has not been established.

The Kephalaia as Text

The Kephalaia is a dense and complex work, evidencing a great concern for detail and structure. Who were its authors and readers? Each kephalaion purports to be the verbatim record of a lesson by Mani, yet it is apparent that it is a constructed text in the process of evolution. The sequencing of chapters shows only a limited rationale, with links established by content (e.g. the actions of the Living Spirit in 42 – 44) or by terminology or some catchphrase regardless of theme (e.g. 'five' in 12 – 16). The incorporation of the number into the title, as with 'The Seventh (kephalaion)', evidences that the sequence is beginning to be fixed; but this is likely only to be true of the very earliest chapters.

Redaction history is also apparent in the body of the material itself. For example the description of the five worlds of darkness that occurs in both chapters 6 and 27, (and in the Mandaean Right Ginza), must rely on some prior source. However, since the redactors must have had ready access to Mani's scriptures, they would not have directly incorporated parts of the canon. Indeed, the lessons are presented as secondary to the scriptures, for on occasion they follow requests for the reiteration in condensed form or explanation of what Mani has written elsewhere (e.g K. 16.25 – 28). Therefore, kephalaic material can be understood to evolve as commentary to revelation.

Given the mass of the text the occasions of true historical reminiscence can be supposed to be limited. Sometimes the chapter begins with a narrative, such as Mani's visits to King Shapur (chapter 76) or his observation of the Tigris in flood (chapter 61). However, such examples are few, and in general the framing sequence for each lesson is minimal and to be regarded as a formal device. One of the wooden boards found at Kellis (T. Kell. Copt. 1) enumerates the 'five σχήματα (properties)' of the Father of Greatness as reflected in the Third Ambassador. It could be termed a kind of 'flip card' or easily memorised summary used for teaching purposes. In style it resembles much of the kephalaiac material, but here lacks the framing sequences where a disciple asks Mani some question.

It would be easy to construct such a sequence, for instance: 'At one of the times when the enlightener (Mani) was sitting in the midst of the congregation, one of the disciples stood up and asked him: Tell us, our master, what are the five properties of the Father about which you have spoken?'.

It can be supposed that a rapid multiplication of kephalaic material occured in this way, as providing apostolic authority for the constructed teachings of the community. Similarly, the repetition of blocks of material in different settings evidences an extended textual history, which belies the assertion that they are verbatim accounts of Mani's teaching.

A number of sequences appear to have attained a stylised form. This is particularly true of the abbreviated summaries of Mani's teaching, which have hints of creedal formulae; and of the concluding thanks given by the disciples. Thus:

> [Mani] says [... the] two essences that are present at the beginning [...] the [lig]ht and the darkness, that which is good and that which is evi[l, life and] death (286.27–30).

> I proclaimed there the word of [truth and li]fe. With [the voi]ce of the proclamation I se[parated the light from the dark]ness there, what is good from [what is evil ...] (186.27–30).

The body of the text is constructed in that some individual chapters appear composite, with blocks of material incorporated where seems appropriate, often with minimal connecting sequences. Thus chapter 26 links together five miscellaneous parables. In chapter 65 Mani lists seven benefits of the sun and seven wickednesses brought by the night. Then follow five further qualities of the sun; and then another set of three. It must be supposed that such blocks circulated independently; and also that some may derive from the teaching of the church after Mani. It seems probable that the source of some material may ultimately be from outside of the community, but for its utility it is brought in to the tradition. Chapter 70 contains two separate schema for relating the zodiacal signs to the parts of the body, schema that have long histories within western astrological tradition.

The delight in numerical sequencing is certainly a feature of Mani's own teaching, thus the five sons of the First Man and the five sons of the Living Spirit. Often the doctrine must be forced to accord to this, such as when pentads are fitted to duodecimal lists. Nevertheless, there are clear catechetical benefits in the approach, especially with a system as complex as this.

Thus, kephalaia develops as a form of discourse within the Manichaean community. In that its basis is the aural memory of the disciples, and this dates to the latter third century c.e., it is perhaps not strictly restricted text. However, it is not basic proselytising material, for the scriptural allusions and sequences presuppose an extensive grasp of the macrotext. Thus, it belongs to the inner circle of the elect and could become a means for argument and demonstration between believing communities; a Manichaean form that has social usages analogous to, for instance, hadith literature in Islam. The Iranian parallels evidence diverging traditions[7]; and the mass of material from the two Medinet Madi codices shows the utility of the form for the development of the tradition. It is thus best not regarded as an apocryphal book, but as an evolving and fluid discourse that retained its vitality in relation to the life and needs of the community.

Summary of the Doctrine

Manichaeism may be termed a gnostic religion; that is, both in a structural-systemic and in an historic sense. As a religious system it offered the promise of acosmic salvation through the revealed knowledge (gnosis) of transcendent realities, including the divine nature of the soul, and the details of the pathway to eternal life. Again, in its historic origins Manichaeism is to be considered together with the mass of related gnostic traditions that flourished during late antiquity. Thus Mani directly utilised prior revelations, and in this way gnostic concepts can be tracked from the esoteric forms of prior Judaisms and Christianities, through Manichaeism, and into later metamorphoses such as in Shi'ite Islam and the neo-Manichaean sects of the medieval period.

Nevertheless, the gnostic character of Manichaeism must be qualified, for Mani turned his revealed knowledge outwards to a universal evangelical purpose. While the elect learnt the secret workings of the divine nature, all were offered the call to faith, and the religion firmly grounded itself in time and the existential world. Therefore, the religion promulgated faith, knowledge and good works; and rose above the obscure and short-lived irrelevancies of most gnostic sects.

While it is possible and important for the historian to trace the diverse elements that Mani drew upon in his revelation, it is first vital to understand Manichaeism as a discrete and coherent entity, for this is how one can enter the world of the believer. The following account of the teachings of Mani will emphasise this inner structure and coherence. Nevertheless, any such summary inevitably tends towards artificial synthesis. Manichaean knowledge was carefully graded and tailored to the needs of its audience, as with any other avowedly evangelical ideology that seeks the power to change people's life and thought. For the lay faithful in the Roman Empire it was a kind of superior Christianity, and the metaphysical details that attract the attention of scholars (and the higher echelons of the elect) had little profile. In the personal letters of the believers at Kellis there appears to be scarce knowledge of or interest in the many gods and demons, or the intricacies of cosmology, such as dominate kephalaic material. The evidence from Kellis shows how carefully the hierarchy attempted to draw adherents further into the church and the gnosis.

Whereas Christianity took centuries to formulate its doctrines, and the controversies of the great councils seem far removed from the teachings of Jesus, Mani took great pains to establish a total religion based upon his own comprehensive scriptures and preaching. He may be said to have combined the charisma of Jesus, the missionary purpose of Paul, and the doctrinal stringency of an Augustine. He understood himself to be the final and universal apostle of God, called to restore the truth of all prior messengers, including Jesus, the Buddha and Zarathustra. There is thus less scope in the study of Manichaeism to trace the evolution of doctrine, since all teaching was rigidly tied to the very details of the divine word in Mani's scriptures. Nevertheless, the eschatological urgency of earliest Manichaeism may be said to have slowly turned towards an accommodation with the world.

The revelation was systematised, in substance at least by Mani himself, into an elaborate and holistic account of the cosmos, human history, and the natural world. Manichaean thought was highly structured and maintained a remarkable uniformity from Roman North Africa to medieval China, claiming to provide a coherent and quasi-scientific explanation of everything from the movement of the stars to the origins of fire and the genera of creatures. The claim to knowledge would have been a source of great appeal, but the provision of such detail in the scriptures also demanded a rigidity that finally undermined the religion. For these reasons it can be misleading to describe Manichaean doctrine as a myth; and it was certainly not intended as an allegory.

Mani's teaching was summarised by the catchphrase, that 'of the two principles and the three times (or moments)'. The two principles are those of light and darkness: whose realms in the beginning are separate, the dark unknowing of the light; then during the middle are in part mingled, the reality of this present universe; but at the end will be the triumph and eternal victory of life and light over death.

In Manichaeism what is true in the macrocosmos is also true for the microcosmos. The individual soul partakes of this whole history, so that our present enfleshment in a demonic body is only the middle time between two eternities. Note too that the dualism is not the hellenistic one of spirit and matter, but of two essences, even substances. The divine life is visible, has spatial and quantifiable elements; and evil matter is the active principle of lust, the elements and 'thought of death'.

Manichaean theology is not easily categorised. The Father evokes or emanates powers of himself for purposes in the cosmic drama, and these too may call forth further gods or angels (chapter 50). The language of 'calling out' the powers of light is crucial, to avoid any suggestion of generation, for sexuality is inextricably tied in Manichaean thought to evil matter and the lust that is its nature.

The Manichaeans, or at least the elect, delighted in establishing elaborate systemisations of these beings; but all the divine is ultimately one, so that the diversification represents levels of descent into or entrapment by darkness. Relationships between spiritual levels, for instance a lay believer or catechumen to an elect, will be an exact image of that relationship all the way back up the scale through the gods to the Father. The same is true of all the representatives of the essence of darkness; so that Manichaean teachings are characterised by elaborate series of parallels and shifts of scale.

In the 'first time' the Father of Greatness rules the realm of light, which indeed is an extension of himself, and has four divine attributes: purity, light, power and wisdom. He resides in five intellectuals or limbs: mind, thought, insight, counsel and consideration. These are otherwise substantially detailed as the five elements: living air, light, wind, water and fire. Surrounding the Father are the twelve aeons, distributed three each to the directions of heaven, and refracted also to the one hundred and forty-four aeons of the aeons.

To the south of this kingdom of life is the realm of the King of Darkness. His form combines the shapes of the animals representative of his five warring worlds and their own Kings, also the corresponding five elements of darkness, (chapter 6). This realm is a seething manifestation of the conflict and carnality that is its essence, Matter, the thought of death. In the course of its constant turmoil, by accident for darkness blindly grasps but can not know, the demonic powers glimpse the light and desire to possess its life. Since peace is the nature of the light the Father must call out from himself the great divinities, both as the only means to defend his kingdom, and to distance the inevitable conflict from the land of light. In the ensuing 'second time' the drama is driven by these gods in the arena of mixture, the universe, while the Father himself remains apart until he can again reveal himself and his inner treasury after the final victory.

First the Father evokes the Great Spirit who is the Mother of Life, and she in turn calls forth the First Man. This is the first emanation, that of the gods of descent. It also evidences a consciously trinitarian structure embedded in Mani's system, which in common with other Syriac forms of Christianity details the Spirit as feminine.

It is the Man who descends to battle. This first born son of God is armed with the five light elements, personified as his five sons; and it is this portion of the divine that is devoured by the powers of evil when the demonic forces defeat the warrior of heaven. This living soul comes to be compounded with the dark elements of matter throughout the universe, and is in need of redemption for the duration of the 'second time'.

So, while this first conflict appears outwardly to result in tragedy, as with the crucifixion the believer understands that it was a necessity for the binding of evil, and will lead to the ultimate victory of the life and light over death. Nevertheless, the inevitable consequence is the distress and suffering of the divine soul, (termed the Cross of Light particularly in the context of vegetation), and personified as the suffering Jesus awaiting redemption. The entire resultant history of the 'second time' involves the mechanics of once more separating the light from darkness; not simply as a return to the first eternity, but rather to fundamentally alter the status and relationship of the two principles by so fatally weakening the power of death that it can never again threaten the life.

In order to establish the arena in which liberation can take place, that is the universe, a new divine trinity is called forth: the Beloved of the Lights, the Great Builder, and the Living Spirit (also termed the Father of Life). This is the second emanation, that of the gods of creation.

It is the task of the Living Spirit to rescue the First Man, which is a prototype of all future redemption; and then to fashion the universe from the powers of darkness in which the light elements, the five sons, are mixed. Thus the Living Spirit descends to issue a 'summons' (or call) to the Man who responds with his affirming 'answer'; and who is then lifted up out of the abyss. This is the archetype of the assent proclaimed by the community at prayer (chapter 122).

Summons and answer are themselves hypostasised into a pair of divinities. Together they are the 'counsel of life' that throughout the time of mixture personifies the awakening and motivating force of the soul and light elements that are sunk in darkness (K. 178.2 – 5). To prepare for that, the Living Spirit and the Mother of Life descend to the abyss. There they defeat the demonic powers and rulers, and out of their bodies fashion the universe. Thus the demiurge is a light god, though the dead matter of the creation is darkness, albeit shot through with the elements of life. The structure of the universe is divinely conceived, even if its matter is evil.

The Living Spirit constructs ten heavens and eight earths, flaying and crucifying some of the evil powers above, and forming the earths out of the bodies of others. To hold the whole elaborate structure in place he evokes his own five sons: the Adamant of Light, the Keeper of Splendour, the King of Glory, the King of Honour, and the Porter (or Atlas). By means of three wheels or garments, fire and water and wind, the three evil vessels of fire and water and darkness are swept down from the heavens; and then finally swept into pits that have been prepared for them. The light elements are freed to ascend to purity and rest (chapters 42 – 43).

The Keeper of Splendour oversees the eighth, ninth and tenth heavens; whilst the King of Honour watches over the lower heavens from the seventh. The King of Glory turns the wheels so that the light elements may ascend. The Adamant humbles sporadic demonic uprisings on earth. The Porter supports the entire structure from below. The sun and the moon are vessels of purified light, and stations on the path of ascent or descent for the redeemed soul and the gods. However, the planets and stars are evil rulers.

Once the machinery for the purification has been made ready by the second series of evoked gods, they all turn to the Father to plea for a new emanation to set the cosmos in motion, and thus to achieve the process of redemption through time (K. 273.15 – 274.11). The Father approves and calls forth his Third Ambassador (or Messenger), so termed because he introduces the third age of the world. He dwells in the ship of the sun; whilst the Virgin of Light, his feminine doublet, has her throne in the ship of the moon. Jesus the Splendour, another in the series of salvific deities, is closely related in Manichaean systematics to this androgynous sun-moon god. This is the third emanation, that of the gods of salvation or ascent.

The Ambassador and Virgin achieve a first redemption of trapped light, again turning the uncontrollable lust of the darkness, which is its nature, back upon it. They reveal their images, or more graphically appear naked, before the male and female rulers (archons) chained in the heavens. These powers spontaneously ejaculate or abort across the cosmos. Some light is drawn to the heights, while the remainder that is more deeply embedded in matter sinks downwards and must endure further degradation before it is redeemed. A part falls into the sea and rises as a monster that the Adamant subjugates. Other dross falls to the earth to become the seeds of plant life that the abortions eat. Such complicated details of prehistory were drawn from a variety of prior traditions, which seem to have fascinated Mani and his followers. Inevitably they drew the attention and ire of their opponents.

The abortions formed a rampaging demonic group from which the different genera of creatures originate, corresponding to the varieties of the five worlds of darkness from which they stem. Adam and Eve are fashioned by demons 'after the image of God' that they have glimpsed, that is the Ambassador who had appeared to the rulers in the heavens; and are procreated after various cannabalistic and sexual acts by the dominant demonic pair: Saclas and Nebroel.

Thus, lust is endemic in human nature. Mankind has been deliberately fashioned by demonic forces in an attempt to prevent the redemption of the light, for through the urge for sex humans will multiply, and further entrap the divine soul in multitudes of material bodies. This inverts the core of Hebrew tradition, that God approves of the creation of man and woman, and ordains that they should 'be fruitful and multiply'. Nevertheless, as with the macrocosmos, the structural form of humans is in a sense divinely conceived (in the 'image'), and acts as a mechanism for the purification of soul.

Since the human soul is a principal repository of the trapped divine, the abortions having concentrated therein such that they had gained from the buds and fruits they had eaten, humans become the focus of the salvific mission of the gods. In an archetypal episode Jesus the Splendour approaches Adam, lying as dead after his creation and without consciousness, and awakens him to the saving knowledge of his own condition. Here Manichaeism has inherited and developed the widespread gnostic retelling and inversion of the 'fall' narrative, so that now the serpent has become entirely transformed into the heavenly redeemer.

The process of redemption enters human history. Again Mani drew upon a variety of non-biblical traditions to develop a complex narrative about the family of Adam. Note the veneration of the virginal Seth, a characteristic feature of esoteric traditions; and the fierce antipathy to female sexuality. In another episode from the early generations it is related how the demons guarded by the King of Honour rebelled, and two hundred of these watchers escaped to earth to wreak havoc and unveil to mankind the mysteries of heaven (K. 92.24 – 32). In these episodes prior Judaic material has been reworked and integrated into the Manichaean system.

The revelation by Jesus the Splendour to Adam is the exemplar for all future human redemption. Gradually over the generations more of the divine soul is liberated, so that 'they that are begotten today, in these last generations, stand diminished and maimed (K. 147.10 – 11)'. To achieve this liberation Jesus evokes the Light Mind, and in turn summons forth the Apostle of Light who becomes incarnate in the great religious leaders throughout history and the world. So, the process of redemption is the work of the Light Mind who transforms the human soul by enlightening and freeing the five intellectuals of light from the shackles of the body and the five members of sin. 'He shall set right the members of the soul; form and purify them and construct a new man of them, a child of righteousness (K. 96.25 - 27)'. This 'new man', a concept ultimately to be derived from Paul, will now display the five virtues of love, faith, perfection, patience and wisdom.

Mani believed that he had been commissioned to make the final and universal proclamation of truth for the last generations. The cycle of true apostleship was important to him. It included patriarchal figures such as Seth, Noah and Enoch; also founders of true religions, in particular Buddha, Zarathushtra and Jesus; and more recent apostles such as the gnostic Nikotheos, and Paul upon whom Mani modelled his own style of mission. Kephalaia chapter 1 provides an extended simile wherein the advent of the apostles is compared to the months of seedtime and harvest. Each apostle is a farmer who plants a church, labouring over it till it matures and ripens. As it finally comes to fruition another will be seeded: 'There is not any time the tree is bare of fruit! (K. 11.26 - 27)'.

The various listings of the apostles evidence Mani's concept of universal revelation-history, and indicate sources that he regarded as authentic. Nevertheless, it is the figure of Jesus that dominates all the others who in comparison are little more than names. Preeminently Mani regarded himself as the apostle of Jesus Christ. United with his divine Twin he becomes the Paraclete foretold, as according to John 14:16 where Jesus promises the disciples that he will ask the Father who will send them another helper, the Spirit of truth, who will remain with them for ever.

As a whole Manichaean Christology draws upon a range of influences that are woven into a coherent thread running through the entire revelation. Regarding the historical Jesus the influence of prior docetic tradition is evident. Christian polemic against the Manichaean Jesus as a phantasm without human birth, and capable of only an illusory suffering, reiterates the arguments raised against the second century heretic Marcion. Similarly, the Manichaeans in their missionary endeavour in the Roman Empire drew upon the Marcionite critique of the Old Testament and the Jewish God, even though in contrast to Marcionism the Manichaean demiurge is good. Again, following Marcion, Mani believed that he had been called to restore the true teaching of Jesus. This had been corrupted and falsely interpreted by Judaisers, against whom Paul had preached, as evidenced by a particular reading of the Pauline epistles. Thus it lay upon Mani to establish a firm canon of scripture that could never again be adulterated.

Mani and the first generation of his church believed that they were living in the last days before the return of Jesus as judge. The powerful salvific and apocalyptic emphases of his teaching are evident in the rich details of the eschatology, both individual and cosmic. At death each soul will be judged, and if triumphant will be greeted by the Form of Light and angels with victory prizes. Devotional texts, such as Manichaean psalms, developed a powerful symbolic language to express this hope.

There are three paths for the soul at death. Gross sinners beyond any hope of redemption will be damned to hell to await the second death at the end of time, when all of matter and the darkness will finally be bound and sealed in its eternal grave. In contrast, the souls of those such as the catechumens, who are not inextricably compounded with lust, will be reborn in new bodies and have the hope of final purification.

The third way is that of the elect, and indeed of all the light freed from dead matter to life, such as that liberated from fruits and vegetables. This divine ascends up the Pillar of Glory, the great porter of souls, to the moon. This Pillar is itself divinised as a god of the third emanation. It is the Perfect Man (see Ephesians 4:12 – 13), the representation of the church as the body of Jesus in its ascent to the Father. The moon in its waxing and waning then provides visual and actual evidence of its role as a ship and stage in the transit of souls; thence to the sun. From the sun the redeemed light passes to the new aeon that has been built by the Great Builder for the time of mixture. Here the gods rest, and the souls must await the final burial of darkness, before the Father will again unveil to them his image, and can once more receive them into his treasury (chapter 39).

Individual and cosmic eschatology are interwoven in Mani's teaching, for each soul's own tragedy and victory are but a microcosm of the history of the universal soul and its liberation from matter. The Sermon of the Great War is an apocalyptic treatise (found in the Medinet Madi codex of Homilies) from the first generation after Mani's death, wherein the eschatological event is understood to have already begun. It utilises material from the gospel tradition; as Mani himself did in his earliest writing, the Shabuhragan. After the horrors of persecution and the final terrors Jesus will return to take the judgement seat that is prepared for him, to separate the sheep from the goats and to reign in glory.

Then will come the great fire that will achieve such final purification of the light still in the world as is possible. This soul will gather up and rise as the Last Statue, a divinity that in essence recapitulates the descent into the abyss of the First Man. The five sons of the Living Spirit will leave their tasks, and the dead husk of the universe will collapse in upon itself to sink to the depths. All the evil will be sealed in an eternal tomb; but the males and females separated so that they can never again renew themselves and threaten the light.

Time in the sense of the workings of the universe and the history of redemption has come to an end. The 'third moment' is a new eternality without fear.

> (The Father) can give the grace to his fighters, they whom he s[ent] to the contest with the darkness. They will roll back and gather [the cu]rtains, and he unveils to them his image. The [e]ntire l[ight] will be immersed in him. They will go in [to the] treasury. They will also come forth from him in glory (H. 41.13–17).

Now there will be two kings, the Father in the aeons of light, and the First Man reigning with the gods in the new age.

The Manichaean Ethic and its Practice in the Church

In the Kephalaia chapters 79 – 93 form a distinct section concerned with the religious praxis of the elect and catechumens. It seems probable that they were gathered together prior to their redaction into the work as it now appears. Indeed, chapter 76, concerning the missions of Mani, has some indications of being a new beginning; whilst 77 and 78 (linked by 'four') seem poorly placed. In any case, this sub-work provides much detail on the actuality of Manichaean concerns and community life.

Mani was himself brought up within the confines of a narrow religious sect; and his teachings, although able to drive a religion of world-wide significance, made radical demands upon his followers. Indeed, the question of submission to the demands of the world was the focus of the Manichaean accusation that the 'Christians' were only half believers who had betrayed the teachings of Jesus. The sudden influx and even visual appearance of these new ascetics from the late third century on may well be taken as one spark that lit the fire of Christian monasticism in the decades that followed.

It is certainly true that the teachings that underpinned this new ethic provoked fierce polemic from the leaders of the catholic community, and indeed also the imperial authorities. On the one hand the belief that the divine substance was scattered through all the material world led to devotional attitudes, for instance towards fruit and vegetables as vessels of the soul, that were received with horror. Christian polemic focussed on the complex food rituals intended to liberate the divine light from matter and pain, and accused the Manichaeans of worshipping the sun and the moon. On the other hand Mani's negative account of creation, and fierce antipathy to matter and sexuality as intrinsically demonic, was equally abhorrent.

For Mani the whole rationale for history, and any continuation of human existence, is the liberation of the light elements from the dark. The Manichaean attitude to marriage was entirely negative as the act of procreation prolongs the imprisonment of soul, which would now be further diversified into matter. Moreover, if a peasant works the land, or if a craftsman uses his tools or a soldier his weapons, then they harm and pain the living soul. The same applies to speech that calls for such activites; or incites immorality, anger or envy.

The principal symbol was that of the Cross of Light, the universal divine stretched and bound upon matter. Particularly the Cross was associated with plant life as manifested in sweetness, colour and translucence; in comparison to the heavy carnality and odour of flesh.

The Manichaeans strove to consume food and drink with as high a percentage of light as possible, such as melons and cucumbers; and indeed were much concerned with the classification and preparation of foods, which inevitably attracted the scorn of opponents. Specifically, meat and wine were regarded as dominated by the dark elements that would reinfect the believer striving for personal purification, and lead directly to sensuality and ignorance.

On the positive side, while the very act of eating caused pain to the light elements, the body as a microcosm of the universe also acted as a machine for the liberation of the divine; so that the righteous person could literally discard the gross elements below, and breathe forth angels to rise above. Chapters such as 85 and 93 express the determination to rise above quietism by showing that the purification of soul achieved by positive action in the world far outways the temporary pain caused.

Such an ethic could only really be applied by a small group of people. Yet, the goal that Mani felt to be his vocation was the foundation and propagation by mission of a world religion. The compromise was achieved, possibly under Indian influence, by instituting a two-tiered structure incorporating a doctrine of transmigration of souls.

The community was divided into an inner circle of the elect ('the virginal') who lived a life of extreme asceticism; around which a greater number of hearers or catechumens ('the continent') gathered, who were able to profit from the piety and righteousness of the spiritually more advanced. In actual fact the catechumens were allowed to marry and carry out normal daily activities; but they were obliged to see to the alimentary needs of the monks, and to dedicate a proportion of their work to the church. This duty brought merit to the hearers who could hope to advance to perfection in a future life (e.g. chapters 80 and 91). Mani was anxious to stress that both hearers and elect depend upon each other.

As the final apostle of God Mani led the community for as long as he lived, and after his 'crucifixion' was believed to have ascended to the moon to wait in attendance upon the faithful. During his life-time, concerned at the corruption of earlier churches, he endeavoured to establish the community for the rest of history through writings, missions, and a strong hierarchy. Until the tenth century the Twin-Cities (al-Mada'in) remained the seat of his successor: the archegos or imam. In standard lists ecclesiastical authority was mediated downwards via twelve teachers (magister or 𐬀𐬌𐬎), seventy-two bishops (episcopus), three hundred and sixty elders (presbyter), and thence to the general body of the elect and hearers[8]. However, the Kephalaia, and indeed the new texts from Kellis, evidences a more fluid use of these terms[9].

In the Roman Empire the religion established an elaborate network of cells both to facilitate evangelism and to avoid detection. In later centuries the episcopal hierarchy seems to have been better preserved in the east, especially whilst it was the dominant religion in the Turfan area during the early medieval period.

In central Asia the Manichaeans finally had the freedom to worship openly, to observe their regular fasts, and to develop church practices. However, the most important festival remained the commemoration of Mani's martyrdom when a judgement seat (bema) was raised in the middle of the worshipping congregation. Upon this was placed a portrait of Mani to celebrate his continuing presence in the community of the elect; and to symbolise his position as proxy for Jesus until his return as judge.

COMMENTS ON THE TRANSLATION

The translation provided here is as complete as the surviving edited Coptic allows. Some passages are very fragmentary, where the overall meaning relies more on the impression given by key terms than actual content. With experience an entire episode such as the Third Ambassador displaying his image, and the establishment of life on earth consequent upon the ejaculation and abortion by the heavenly rulers, can be hung by the reader on a slight recurrence of terminology: '[... Amb]assador [... fell to] earth'. Thus the translation attempts to render the lacunose text as accurately as possible. The placing of brackets reproduces the reconstructions of the edited text, with the aim to aid the reader with limited Coptic. Perhaps this is over zealous.

Similarly, the heavily didactic and repetitious style of the original is reflected in the English. The translator's problem is to reproduce intention and not to be misled by the structures of language as system. Inevitably this becomes a matter of interpretation: when is it that the text is repetitive for didactic purposes and when is it the nature of Coptic? This translation errs towards inclusion and faithful representation, hopefully not at the expense of sense. It seems that the style is dense and loaded; terms are ossified and even social and political frameworks appear archaic in the original.

Whilst the English translation endeavours to reproduce the style of the original, the format has been altered in order to try and render it more readable. In particular the text has been broken up into shorter units of paragraphs and lists. Some of these are warranted in accordance with indentations used by the scribe, but the practice has been applied with more consistency. Also, each chapter has been provided with a brief introductory commentary to provide context for the reader, and to aid review of the work as a whole. The Coptic word ⲥⲉϩⲉ ('word' or 'saying') has, where applicable, been rendered as 'lesson'; for this seems best to indicate the quality of Mani's discourses that are the basic material for the constructed Kephalaia.

In general there is an attempt to reproduce significant terms and phrases consistently. However, some latitude is necessary to balance consistency with readability. Policies that have been followed are always to use an English term rather than, say, the Greek (thus 'lump' for bolos); to be sparing in the usage of capitals; and also to attempt to provide an equivalent even where the exact meaning of the original is unclear (thus 'sect of the basket' in chapter 121). Often translations can make the original appear overly arcane by the constant highlighting of the technical. This is a problem with a system as complex as Mani's, with a universe populated by numerous gods and demons. In general capitals are used only for the 'great' gods such as the Living Spirit, while subsidiary figures ('five sons of') and epithets are not capitalised. It is difficult to make this policy entirely coherent, but the index will evidence the intention.

The index itself is an aid to the reader. The listing of epithets and alternative titles (the 'Father of Life' is the Living Spirit) helps to clarify the text, whilst hopefully not being overly interpretative. The many epithets and fluid functions of the spiritual entities in Mani's universe make it difficult to achieve closure in this process, and total consistency can not be claimed.

••• (Introduction) •••

(1,1 - 9,10)

The introductory section cannot properly be termed a kephalaion. Rather, it is a framing sequence; and a justification for the entire work.

The text (when readable) begins with a grand survey of the crucial moments in the cosmogonic drama: the eternal separation of the two principles at the beginning; the attack by the darkness, and consequent emanation and descent of the First Man in defence of the light; the construction of the universe by the Living Spirit; the role of the Third Ambassador as supreme redeemer; the destruction of the cosmos in the great fire, and final binding of the darkness; the reintegration of the divine, and victory of the Father (– 5.20).

Mani then asserts his revelation of total wisdom in his canonical scriptures. However, he also stresses his oral teaching; and urges his followers to write down what he has taught them. This appears to provide justification for the Kephalaia, as a sub-canonical text (– 7.6).

Mani acknowledges the true proclamation by earlier apostles, detailing Jesus, Zarathustra and Buddha. However, they did not write their own scriptures; and so their teachings were adulterated, and their churches will decay and pass away (– 8.28).

In consequence, Mani again admonishes his disciples to remember and write down his teachings (– 9.10).

/ Concerning the Ad[vent] / of the Apostle.

The succession of apostles and churches is compared to the continuous cycle of seedtime and harvest. A new apostle releases the spiritual forms of his church, (the heavenly twin motif); and then is sent to earth to sow the seed of his election, at the very moment that the previous church finally ripens to harvest and ascends. Thus, there is no moment when the world is bereft of the means of salvation (see 11.26 – 27).

This recognition of the authenticity of each cycle of revelation is one of the most striking aspects of Mani's teaching. While Mani is likely to have developed it from the concept of the true prophet, found in his Elchasaite heritage and in other Jewish-Christian sects, and it also owes something to Marcion's idea of the renewal of Jesus' true revelation by Paul and himself; nevertheless, the universal application seems to be the product of Mani's particular religious genius. It also, by an historical connection which is not yet clear, may well have influenced the notion of cycles of prophecy that appears in emergent Islam.

The chain of apostles is traced from Sethel, (as in other gnostic teachings), through Enos and Enoch to Sem. Two figures from Indian tradition are then included, the Buddha and Aurentes (from 'arhant'?); and finally Zarathustra and Jesus. Other Manichaean texts provide similar lists, and the concept was open-ended enough to allow the inclusion of other apostles such as Hermes Trismegistus or Lao-Tzu to accord with the missionary expansion of the religion (see Puech 1949: 144 – 146 and now particularly K (Dub). 299). Nevertheless, while universality is obviously the intention, it is noticeable that only Jesus receives any significant detail or historical context. It is difficult to find evidence that Mani had any real knowledge of the lives and teachings of figures such as the Buddha.

Docetic emphases that can be traced back to Marcion are embedded in the Manichaean accounts of Jesus. This kephalaion is particularly interesting for an understanding of Mani's religious heritage because he follows the chain of apostles from Jesus to Paul, and then to one (or two?) righteous man in the Christian church (13.30 – 35). The identity of this figure has been much debated, but the obvious candidates are Elchasai, Marcion, and perhaps Bardaisan.

After the ascent of the church of Jesus Mani's apostolate begins. Thus, the authenticity of later Christianity is rejected. As he foretold, according to the gospel of John, Jesus sends after him the Paraclete. This is Mani's own Twin-Spirit who reveals to him the totality of truth, the knowledge that Mani will then preach and write in his canonical scriptures. The summary of the essentials of revelation given here (14.27 – 15.24) is one of the best known from Manichaean texts; and has an almost creedal ring to it. Mani finishes with a brief summary of his missionary journeys, and a repetition of his claim to direct revelation. His own apostolate is superior to those before him because it has spread throughout the world; and thus it will last till the final judgement and the return of Jesus (16.3 – 17).

In the framing sequence at the end the disciples are enlightened and thank Mani; and assert that he is the Paraclete. Thus he has become one with his heavenly Twin, 'a single Spirit (see 15.23 – 24)'.

15 The first chapt[e]r is this: His disciples [questioned / h]im concerning his ap[os]tolate and his coming to the wor[ld; / fo]r [h]ow did it happen [... his] / journeying in each city, in each la[nd]; / in what [manner] was he sent [... 20 ...] first, before he had yet chosen h[is church]. /

The apostle [sa]ys to them: I [... / ...] but I will recount to you [... / ... / ...] Understand, O my beloved ones: [A]ll the apost[les] 25 who are on occasion sent to the world re[semble] / farmers; while their churches, which they choose, [are] / like Pa[rm]uthi and Paophi. For, the way Parmuthi [occ/u]rs not in all the months of the year; nor [does Paophi / ...] in all of them. Rather, the season [... 30 ...] for it alone, as they know [... / ...] its vegetables [... / ...] the time they are cropped; also the vegetables and the [... / ...] season; and they tend and ripen the pickings, and they / [...] to Paophi. Of course, now that farmer (10) [...] Parmuthi; in that, if he will come and sow some corn seed th/[ere ...] cereal. And he shall be involved from the beginning / [...] a corn seed and toil for it. Yet, when the summer / [comes] each year, and his corn comes to the season of its harvest; 5 [then] the farmer comes forth and harvests it. Even the ga[rdener] from the begin/[ning ...] shall toil for his fruits; and he tends them and he / [...] and they ripen; and he comes forth and picks them from the tree. /

[This is the way of the] apostles who are come to the [wo]rld. They are l/[ike] a [...] of the greatness [...] the season that [... 10 ...] flesh. Rather, they are sent before [... / ...] before they had yet [...] in the wo/[rld ...] from the greatness. They [...] to the [whole] created order; / [and they] choose a selection of the [..., as t]hey make [... / ...] the elect and the catechumens [... 15 ...] their forms, and they make them [free ... / ...] in the flesh [... / ...] the world / [...] to above / [...] as he may make his [...] the winter, and he harvests it 20 [...] also tend to the fruit in the summer and the / [... P]aophi, and he takes them away.

Also the way [... / ...] many years before [... / ... the w]orld, as he journeys below to the [... / ... makes the f]orm of his church free, and [... [25] ...] of the flesh, whose form[s] he had made free / [...]

Like the farmer, for when he will [... / ...] that moment he shall begin [... t]end / [...] it reaches Parmuthi also, he may harvest it [... / ...] toil for the fruits of Paophi [... [30] ...]

Again, this too is [how] the apostl[es ... / ...] from the beginning of the moulding of humanity [... / ... a]s I have t[ol]d you, that when they [... / ...] before every thing he shall [... / ...] free above, first.

Yet, when (11) it [will be] born in the flesh, he shall come down to it and at once [...] it in the [...] / which comes out from the [...] is [r]aised up / to the greatness. [He] shall continue in the world at this time [...] / him, corresponding to the season when the world will come to his [...] [5] when the season will mature he is raised up from the world [...] / and he leaves his church {behind}*2 and goes forth. Still, he [... / ...] and he helps and aids his church. / Whoever comes out from their body after him, he shall be[come] / for them a s[uppo]rt and a leader; and he goes on before them [...], [10] excepting the othe[rs] who are set firmly in the fles[h]. / The Second, concerning / the Parable of the Tree.

The use of Jesus' parable about the two trees as a proof-text for dualism was already a key feature of Marcion's exegesis (e.g. Tertullian adv. Marc. 1.2.1; 4.17), from which it must be traced to Mani, and is thence found throughout Manichaean texts (e.g. PsBk2. 56.21 136.20-21. Augustine c.Adim. XXVI).

In this kephalaion Mani begins by discussing sectarian interpretations of the parable. Unfortunately this section is very fragmentary, but it seems to be concerned with the mixture between the two principles that occurs during time and in the cosmos, so that no person or thing of composite nature can be singularly good or evil (17.16 - 19.28).

Mani then presents his own definitive revelation. The limbs of the good tree are the five intellectual qualities through which the soul ascends to the Father and the aeons of glory (20.21 - 31). This equation of the internal mental process of salvation with the eschatological journey through the heavens indicates a living spirituality in Mani's teaching that is often missed by commentators. The fruit of the good tree is Jesus the Splendour, that is Jesus as the universal redeemer and incarnation of divine Intellect, and thus the 'father of all the apostles'. Consequently, its taste is the community of the church.

As an exact negative of this the evil tree is also made up of five intellectual qualities. However, in this case the mental process is directed towards sin and darkness; and the corresponding eschatological journey takes this soul to the ultimate death where it is compounded with the final 'lump' beyond all hope of redemption (21.27 – 22.20). The text does not preserve the fruit of the evil tree; but its taste is the sects that always oppose the true churches.

The chapter ends with an important semi-creedal assertion of belief in absolute dualism (22.35 – 23.13).

35 The first parable that they asked him about! They besought [him to ex]/plain it for them.

This is the [occ]asion that [... (17) ...]; for his discip[les, who sat] / before him, questioned him. 15 The Interpretation of Happiness, / Wisdom and Power; what they signify. /

Mani contrasts true happiness, wisdom and power to their perceived meaning in the world. In a schema that will be repeated throughout the Kephalaia, these principles are successively identified with the various levels of divinity (here five) as it descends into time and the universe.

Thus the archetypes are the great Gods in the eternal kingdom, untouched by the conflict with darkness; reflected then in the first evoked gods who have entered into time for the purpose of redemption, and who inhabit the two ships (the sun and moon), which can be regarded as the gateways to eternity for the purified light; then the divine elements and subsidiary gods who have descended into the mixed universe; and finally the human members of the church.

[Once aga]in the enlightener speaks to his disciples, whil[e / he si]ts in the assembly of the church: [What] are these thr/[ee things] that in the world are called 'happine[ss', 20 'wisdom]', and 'power'? People boa[s]t of th[em / ...] the happiness of the world [... / ...] in the world it has a [... / ...] of the world shall pass by. /

[People boa]st of them. They praise [... 25 ...] Now, [the] thing is revealed in a [... / ...] as I have told you. /

[I will t]each you of another happiness [... / and another wi]sdom [...] and together another power [...] / So, now, listen that I may reveal to you 30 [how] it is [with] these three: [ha/ppiness], wisdom and power. /

[The happin]ess of the glorious one is the Father, the God of / [truth, who] is established in the great land of [light]. (24) His glorious wis[d]om is his Great Spirit that [... / ...] below, which flows through all his aeons, / and t[h]ey float therein. His great power is all the / gods, the rich ones and the angels who were 5 summoned from him as they [...] t/hey that are called aeons [... / ... /

... / which is called] the sun [... 10 the ship of] living fire, [... the Third / Amba]ssador, the second greatne[ss ... The] / glorious

[happiness] is the [Living] Spirit, [... / ..., the wisdom] is the Mother of Lif[e ... / ... and great power] is [all] the gods, [the rich o]nes and the angels who are within the ship. /

Again, [h]appiness, wisdom and power exist in the s[hip of liv/ing waters ...] the happiness [... / ...] the Mind of the Father. / Also, wisdom [is the Vir/gi]n of [Li]ght. And the power that is [i]n the ship is [all] the go[ds], the [ri]ch ones and the angels who are established i[n it].

Again, these three exist in the elements: happiness, wis/d[o]m and power. The happiness is [the Pillar of Glory], / the Perfect Man. Wisdom is the [five sons of the] / Living Spirit; and great powe[r is ... the fi]ve sons of the First Man [... who are encl]/osed and compounded in the totality, that [...] / while he supports the totality. /

Now, moreover, happiness, wis[dom and power ex/ist] in the holy church. Great, glorious, [happines]s is the Apostle of Light [who has been s]/ent from the Father. Wisdom [is the leaders / and] the teachers who travel in the [holy] church, [proclaiming] / wisdom and truth. Great [power is ... (25) ...] all [the] elect, the virgins and the c[ontinent; / together with the] catechumens who are in the [holy] church. /

[...] five happinesses, the five wisdoms, [a]nd five powers [... / ...] in the five chur[ches]. Blessed, [therefore], is every one who will know them, for he may [... / ...] the kingdom forever.

/ Concerning the Four great Days / th[at have] come forth from one another; together with the Four Nights. /

The concept of the four days and four nights is temporal in the sense that, as each unravels from the last, it represents a descent / ascent from the polarity (the Father / the land of darkness) into the human sphere, where the choice between the two is met (the true church / the sects as representations of the new and the old man).

The schematic elaboration of days and hours is somewhat artificial. Certainly, as a systematisation, it is secondary to other doctrinal taxonomies. The purpose seems to be to enable Mani to link together a number of details around the theme of 'twelve'; and thus to strengthen the coherence of the revelation as a whole.

The twelve aeons or rich gods of the land of light are met elsewhere (see PsBk2. 1.13). Also, the twelve virgins of the Ambassador are known as a variant or elaboration upon the Virgin of Light, his feminine identity. Since Jesus is really the Ambassador's doublet, and the Virgin is sophia, this explains the twelve wisdoms of the fourth day. The summons and the obedience are the vocalisation of the salvific process, the archetype of which is the rescue of the First Man by the Living Spirit. The pairing of these divinities with the respective sets of Five Sons is used variously to elaborate doctrinal details (compare 43.2 – 4).

The necessary sets of twelve hours for the nights appear mostly artificial, since Manichaean doctrine regarding the land of darkness and the worlds of flesh is dominated by pentads. Nevertheless, the link between the sects and the zodiacal signs is found elsewhere (see 48.34 – 5); and the idea that false religions are determined by the planets and the stars is a mainstay of gnostic systems and Mandaeism. The emphasis upon the First Man as a snare is a recurrent feature of Mani's knowledge, and indicates the Christological basis for this doctrinal complex.

Once again the enlightener speaks: Four great days have come / [forth from one another; they] were evoked [out] of one another! The first / [great day] is the Father, the God of truth, the fir[st ... / ... m]idst the aeons of his greatness, in his [l]iving [ki[15]ngdom]. The twelve hours of this great day / [are the] twelve great rich Gods of great[ness. / These], who are the first evocations that he evoked (to mirror) / [h]is greatness, he spread out to the four climes, three b/y three before his face.

[20] The second day is the Third Ambassador, the one w/ho dwells in the light ship. His twelve ho[urs] are / [the] twelv[e v]irgins that he evoked in his greatness. /

[The third day is the Pillar of Glory, the great po/rter that is greater than] all [the po]rters; the one that supports all [...], [25] those above and those below. Its twelve hours are / the five sons [of the F]irst Man; the five sons of the Living Sp[ir]it, / who support all the weights of the uni/[v]erse; together with the summons and the obedience, which are counted to their ten / brethren. These are the twelve light hours of the th[30]ird da[y].

The fourth day is Jesus / the Splendour who [dwells in] his church. His twelve / [h]ours are the twelve wisdoms, which are his / [light] h[o]u[rs].

These are the four great days that have come / [forth from one another, wh]ich were evoked out of one another. They [... Blessed is] every [o]ne who will know them, and / [...] the light!

(26) [...]: For just as four day[s ex]/ist, s[o] too four nights exist. / The first nigh[t] is the land of darkness. It has t[w]e/[l]v[e] black [shadows] therein, which are its dark h[o]ur[s]. The twelve shadows of the f[irst ni]/ght a[re] the five elements of the land of darkness, [which] / poured [fo]rth from its five sense organs; and [...] / which [...] in its [fi]ve elements and its five [...] / the five [sp]irits that dwell in its elements [...] These a[re] the twelve shadows and spirits of the fi[rst] ni[ght]. /

The second night is Matter, the sculptress [... / ...] who has sc[ulpted ... / a]nd the entire [ru]ling-power that is in the worl[ds of darkness]. / She has fashioned it in five sense organs, five [male] and five female, two per world; together with the fire and [the lu]/st [that] dwell in men and women, inflaming [them] / inward to one another. These are the twelve spirits of this [sec]/ond night. Indeed she, this Matter, the thought of death, / ga[ve] the King of the realms of Darkness and his powers strength for the w[20]ar and the fight, against the aeons of greatness. Yet, / he was caught! They laid a snare for him through the Fi[rst M]an. [He] was ta[ken] / t[o ...] through the powers [... He] was brought [u]/p from the land of death and s[et ... ab]/ove and below in the [whole] universe; in the five par[t[25]s] in the heavens above, as well as the five [parts] / in the earths below; together with the heat [and the] cold that / are the father and the mother, their fire and their l[u]st. /

This is the second night that is begotten [fr]om the first ni/ght. They laid a snare for her through the First M[a]n. She was brought u[p] by the hand of the Living Spirit, and set in this composite univers[e ...] / he[r], above and below. Again, [it] too, the third night that is in [the] worlds of fl[e]sh, was begotten from the sec[o]nd / [ni]ght; which the Living [Spir]it crucified in the uni/[verse ..., ab]ove and below in heaven [... /...]

The fourth night is the law of [si/n, which] is the dark spirit who speaks in the twelv[e spirits], the twelve sects. They are the nakedne/[sses], the twelve zodiacal signs of Matter. They / [are] her thrones; she who is made public, as she sculpts and is dis/[p]layed in the old man. And, also, the hours of this four[t/h] night that is the old man, who reigns in the sects, are the [tw]elve e[vi]l spirits; the [...] of the old man, which / [are ... / ... / ... / ... di]fferentiate the day and night [... ... of] death. This is the fourth ni/[ght ...] that have come forth of one another. One has [... / ...] just like the days of lig[ht / ...] they manifested one another. So als[o / ...] they did arise out of one another.

[Bl]essed is he [who wi]ll know them, and separate them, and / [... for] ever! (28)

/ Concerning Four Hunters of / Light and Four of Darkness. /

The parallel reverse imagery evident in this kephalaion is typical of Manichaean doctrine. In this instance the powers of light and darkness are compared to hunters trawling various seas from ships and with nets. The teaching is structured in terms of the cosmic history, presupposing a prior knowledge of the entire cycle from the descent of the First Man to the ascent of the Last Statue and the everlasting death of sinners. Thus, the redeeming work of the Third Ambassador, achieved by the revelation of his image in the heavens, is prior to that of Jesus, whose net is the wisdom cast from the church.

Once again the apostle speaks to his discipl[es]: [5] There are four hunters who were sent from [the li]/ght to fulfill the will of the greatness. /

The first hunter is the First Man who was sen[t] / from the greatness. He threw himself down to the five storehouses / [of] d[ar]kn[ess, h]e caught and siezed the enmity [... [10] ...] his net also [... / ...] out over all the children of darkness [... / ...] His ship is his four sons who are swathed / over his body. The sea is the la[nd of darkness ... / ...] his net is [...] [15] and his powers.

The second [hunter is the Th]/ird Ambassador. This one, for by his [lig]ht image, / which he revealed to the depths be[low], / he hunted after the entire light that is in al[l] things; [as it is establ/i]shed in them. His net is his light image, [20] [...] the whole universe and took it prisoner, / to this likeness [... His] / ship is his light ship. [The sea] is the universe [...] / which were hunted after by his n[et ... / ... [25] ...] his [glorious] image. /

The third hunter is Je[sus the Splendour, who came from the] great/[ness], who hunts after the light and lif[e; and he ...] it / to the heights. His net is his wisdom, [the] lig[ht wisdom] / with which he hunts the souls, catching them in the n[et]. [30] His ship is his holy church [... The sea is / the] error of the universe, the law o[f sin ...] / the souls that are drowning in it [...] He catch[es] / them in his net. They are the souls [... / th]em by his light wisdom.

[The fourth] [35] hunter is the great counsel that [...] / that lives in the circuit [...] (29) entire universe in it today. Yet, at the end, in the dissoluti/[on] of the universe, this very counsel of life / [will] gather itself in and sculpt its soul in the / Last [St]atue. Its net is its Living Spirit*[10], becau[5][se] with its Spirit it can hunt after the light and the life that is in / all [t]hings; and build it upon its body. Its ship, in which it / [is est]ablished, is this light cloud whereby it itself trav/[els] in the five elements [... / the] great fire that will burn all the buildings of [... [10] ...] in its net is the light and the [life. It can] / rescue and free it from all bonds and fetters. /

Blessed is ev[ery] o[n]e who will be perfect in his deeds, so that / at his end [he may escap]e the great fire that is prepared for the uni/verse at [the end of] its time!

O[nc]e again he [s]peaks: As I have revealed to you the four / living hunters of light who belong to the greatness, / [I will] also [t]each you about four other evil hunters who ca/me from the darkness.

The first hunter is the King / of they who belong to the darkness, who hunted after the living soul with his net at the beginning of the worlds. His net is his fi/re and his lust that he has put upon the living soul, / with which he has entangled it [...], through all his powers. /

[The] sec[ond] h[unter i]s the evil counsel that lives in / [...] that hunts after [the] light [...] and [...] / up from [...] the earths to heaven. It binds them with / its powers, which b[ring] them to the heavenly worlds above. / [I]ts net is [...] whereby they are drawn up / [fr]om the abyss [to the heig]hts.

The third hunter is lust [...] walks in every power of the flesh that wa/[lks ...] in the [...] the living souls [... / ... t]hem in its bodies, which [... / ... / ...]

The fourth [hunter is the spirit] of darkness, the law of sin and (30) death, that rules in every sect. It hunts after the so[ul]/s of people and entangles them with this erroneo[us] teaching. / Then it drives them to eternal punishment. It[s] / net, whereby it hunts souls to death, is its erroneous teaching full of guile and villainy / and wicked turns. It imprisons foolish people wi[th] / its teaching, subduing them under its net and co[mpelling them to] eternal punishment.

Blessed is e[very] one [w]/ho will recognise these evil hunters through know[ledge, and it will s]ave and free them from their bond and fetter [for ever] and ever!

/ Concerning the Five Storehouses that have po[ured f]orth / from the Land of Darkness since the [Beginning]; [15] the Five Rulers, the Five Spiri[ts], / the Five Bodies, the Five Tastes. /

Elaborate and highly schematic descriptions of the kingdom of darkness, and its powers, are a feature of Manichaean (and anti-Manichaean) writings that must derive from canonical sources. The overall conception, with its delight in pentads, and a certain attention to what can be termed the psychosymbolism of evil, has a stamp that is unmistakably Mani's. Specific features such as the 'five trees' appear in other gnostic writings, and may serve to indicate Manichaean influence, rather than vice-versa.

Kephalaion 6 (and compare also 27) evidences some textual development; and probably some corruption in the tradition. The redactor appears unsure about the relationship of the supreme King of Darkness (30.33 – 33.1) to his five warring rulers in the various sub-kingdoms; but tends toward identifying him with the King of Smoke (33.2 – 4). He is thus to be distinguished from the ruler or King of the sub-world of Darkness (33.33 – 34.5). Manichaean writings are also unclear about the relationship of the supreme King to personified Matter, who here appears to be prior to him as his fashioner (31.8 – 16). These points have been discussed by H. -Ch. Puech (1948); who also shows that the parallel passage in the Mandaean Right Ginza XII, 6 (278 – 282) is secondary to the Kephalaia

Once again the enlightener speaks to his disciples: Five s[to]/rehouses have arisen since the beginning in the land of darkne[ss! The] fiv[e] / elements poured out of them. Also, from the five e[le][20]ments were fashioned the five trees! Again, from the five tre[es] / were fashioned the five genera of creatures in each wor/ld, male and female. And the five worlds thems[el]ves [ha]/ve five kings therein, and five spiri[ts, five] bodies, five [tastes]; / in each world, they n[ot] resembling [one another]!

[25] The King of the world of Smoke [...] / who came up from the depth of [darkness; this is he who is] / the head of all wickedness, and [all] mal[ignity]. The beginning of / the spread of the war occured [thr]ough him; all the battl[es], / fights, quarrelling, dan[ger]s, destructions, f[i][30]ghts, wrestling-contests! That is the o[ne who fir]st [made] arise [dan]/ger and war, with his worl[ds and his] powers. Af[te]/rwards, also, he waged war with the light. H[e pitched] a battle wi[th] / the exalted kingdom.

Now, regar[ding the King] of Darkness, / there are five shapes on him! His head [is lion-faced; his] hands and feet are demo[n- and devil]-faced; [his] / shoulders are eagle-faced; while h[is] belly [is dragon-faced]; (31) his tail is fish-faced. These five shapes, the marks of his / [fi]v[e] worlds, exist on the King of the realms of Darkness! /

Now, [th]ere are five other properties*11 in him. The first is his / [dark]ness. The second is his putridity. The third is h[i]s ugliness. The fourth is his bitterness, his own soul. / The fifth is his burning, which burns like an / iron {}*12 as if poured out from fire. /

[There are] also th[r]ee oth[ers] in him! The first, that hi[s body / is ha]rd and very tough, even as she has formed him [...] cru[el-hear]ted; namely Matter, who is the though[t] of death, / [the o]ne w[ho] sculpted him from the nature of the land of dark/ness. T[his] is the manner [of] the body of the ruler of Sm[oke]. He is h/[ar]der than every [ir]on, copper and steel and / [lea]d; as there is no cleaver at all, nor any iron implement, can [...] him and cut him. For Matter, his fashioner, has formed him / [...] strong and hard.

The second, that he wounds / [an]d kills by the word of his magic arts. His recitation and / hearing, all his foolish instruction, make magic / and invocations for him. When it pleases him, he can make an invocation [o]ver himself, and by his magic arts be hidden from his compan/[ions]. Again, when it [plea]ses him, he can be manifested over his powers / [and] appear to [them]; so that these enchantments nowadays, which peo/[ple] utilise (?) [...] this world, are the mysteries / [of] the King of Da[rkness]. Concerning this, I command you (pl.) all the [ti]me: K[ee]p away from the magic arts and enchantments / [of] darkness! For any person who will be taught them, / and who [d]oes and accompl[ishes them]; at the last, in the place wh[ere] will be bound the King / [of] the realms of Darkness with his powers, there they will bind t/[ha]t one also, [the s]oul of whoever has lived freely among them and [wal]ked in the [magic ar]ts of error. Whether it is a man or a / [woman, this is] the sentence given, cut / [... f]rom God's judgement, that whoever will / [...] with their King.

(32) The third, that the King of the realms of Darkness knows the [co]/nverse and language of his five worlds. He understands / every thing he hears from their mouths, as they address one / another; each one of them in his language. [Every] design [5] they will consider against him, every snare they d/ebate with one another to bring upon him, he knows them! / He can also understand the gesturing they signal / between one another. Yet, his powers and his rulers, / who are s[ub]ject to him, can not understand his wordy converse. While all these things [10] are unveiled to him; still, their heart is not manifested to him. He k[n]/ows not their mind nor their thought; he can not ponder their / beginning and their end. Rather, he only knows and ap/prehends what is before his eyes. /

Also, another different thing is found in the King of [the] realms of Darkness! [15] For when it pleases him to move, he spreads all his limbs / out and walks. When it comes to mind, he with[draws] / his limbs and takes them in, and is rolled (?) to / his companions; and he falls to the ground like a grape and a / great iron ball! He terrifies by his cry, [20] he is frightful. He frightens his powers with his [s]ound; bec[a]/use when he speaks, being like thunder / in the clouds, he resembles the [...] of the rocks [...] / When he cries out and [...] and calls [...] / over his powers, they shall tremble and to[tter a]nd fall under f[oot]; [25] even as some birds would be [...] the bird [... / ...] and they fall down to the earth. Still, [thi]s thing only: / he knows not what is far from him, he sees not w[ho is at] / a distance, nor does he hear him. Rat[her], whoever is befo[re] / his face he sees, hea[ri]ng him and [30] knowing him.

These sign[s a]nd these evil mar/ks are found in the chief of the d[e]mons and / fiends, the King of all the mountains of Darkne[ss ... the one] to [whom] / the land of darkness has given birth, be[gotten in its cru]/elty, in its wickedness and its wrath [...] (33) more than all his fellow rulers, who are in all his worlds. /

body of all the powers who belong to the world of Sm/oke is gold. And also, the taste of its fruits is s[5]alty. The spirit of the King, of the realms of Darkness, is this one who reigns / today in the principalities and authorities of the earth and the entire un/iverse. I mean these who reign over the entire creation, / humiliating mankind with tyranny, according to their heart's desire. /

In contrast, the King of the worlds of Fire is lion-faced, the fore[10]most of all the beasts. Copper is his bo[dy]. Again, [the bo]/dy of all the rulers who belong to Fire is copper. / Their taste is the sour taste that is in every form. / Also, the spirit of the King, of they that belong to the world of Fire, is this one / who reigns i[n the] greater ones and the leaders; who are under [15] the command of the principalities and authorities and the kings of the wo/rld. Also a spirit of his is found in these sects / that worship [fi]re, as their sacrifices are offered to fire. /

Again, the King of the wor[l]d[s] of Wind is eagle-face. His / body is iron. Also, the body of all they who belong to [20] the Wind is iron. Their taste is the sharp taste th/at is in every form. His spirit is the one of idolat/ry to the spirits of error who are in every temple, the sit[es] of ido/[l]s, the sites of statue- and image-worship, the shrines o/[f the] error of the world.

[25] For his part, [the K]ing of the w[o]rld of Water is fish-face. His / body is silv[er]. All the other rulers who belong to Water, / silver is their body. Also, the taste of their fruit is / [the] sweetness of water, the sweet taste that is in every (form). / Again, the spirit of the King, of the rulers of Water, is this one who r[30]eigns today in the sects of error; these that / [d]ip the baptism of the waters, (setting) their hope / [and] their tru[st] in the baptism of the waters. /

Again, [the Kin]g of the [wor]ld of Darkness is a dragon. His / [body is lead] and tin. All the other rulers [35] [who belong to the world of] Darkness, their body is lead and (34) tin. And also, the taste of their fruits is bitt/erness. Again, the spirit who reigns in them is the spirit / who speaks till today in the soothsayers, giving oracl[es]; / in the givers of portents, every typ[e]; in they who are poss[5]essed; and the other spirits that give oracles, every type. /

Concerning this I tell you, my [bret]hren and my li/mbs, the perfect faithful, the holy elect: / Hold your heart close to you, and you stay away from the / five enslavements of the five dark spirits. Put [10] behind you the service of their five bodies. Li/ve not in them, that you may break loose their chain / and their chastening for ever!

/ The Seventh, concerning [15] the Five Fathers. /

This is one of the best known of the kephalaia, due to its full and ordered account of the evocation of various Manichaean divinities. However, it is important to note that the schema of the 'five fathers' is not an archetypal classification prior to all the other theological taxonomies evident throughout the texts; but, rather, only a partial and conditioned representation of the overall system. Thus, temporally, the Third Ambassador is the principal divinity of the third evocation (redemption). In the first evocation (descent) the Father summons the Mother of Life, who then calls forth the First Man and his five sons. In the second (creation) it is the Beloved of the Lights, and then the Living Spirit and his five sons. Kephalaion 7 is concerned with the sequence from the Father through the Ambassador; and its purpose is, therefore, the emanation of the divinities from the aspect of redemption.

Once again the enlightener, our father [the] apostle of / truth, is sitting in the midst of his disciples and pr/eaching to them of the greatnesses of God. Again, he speaks t/o them like this, in his revelation: Five fathers [20] exist, they were summoned forth one of one. [Also], one did come / out of another!

The first Father is the Father of Grea/tness, the blessed one of glory, the [on]e who has no measure to his gr[ea]/tness; who also is the first o[n]ly begotten, the f[i]/rst eternal; who exists with fiv[e fa]thers for ever; [25] the one who exists before every thing that has existed, and th/at will exist.

Now he, the glorious Father, summon[ed] from him / three emanations. The [fi]rst is the Gre[at] / Spirit, the first Mother, who came out of the Father. She app/eared first.

The seco[nd i]s the Belo[ved of] [30] the Lights, the great glori[ous] Beloved, [the one w]ho is honour[ed; w]/ho came out of the Father. [He ma]nifested ou[t of h]im. /

The third father*[13] is the Thir[d Ambassador], / the eldest of [al]l the counsell[ors; who came out of] (35) the first Father. He appeared.

This is the first Father, / the first power, the one from whom the three great powers came out, / This is the first Father, the first eternal, the root / of all the lights; from whom the three emanations came out. [5] They have humiliated the darkness. They have brought its heart's desire to naught. They have / given themselves the victory. They have also given the victory to their aeons. /

The second father, who came out of the first Father, is the Th/ird Ambassador, the model of the King of lights. / And again, he too summoned and sent out of him thr[10]ee powers.

One is the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man; / the one who bears up under all things; the great Pillar / of blessing; the great porter, who is greater than all the po/rters.

The second is glorious Jesus the Splendour; / [the] one through whom shall be given life eternal.

The th[15]ird is the Virgin of Light, the glorious wisd[o]m; the on/e who takes away the heart of the [rul]ers and the powers by her image, as she fulfi/lls the pleas[u]re of the greatness. /

The third father, who came out of the second father; h/e is glorious Jesus the Splendour. And, again, he too summoned [20] three evocations after the pattern of the second father. /

The first power whom he summoned is the Light Min[d], / the father of all the apostles, the eldest of [a]ll the [ch]urches; / the one whom Jesus has appointed corresponding to our pattern in the holy chur/ch.

The second power whom Jesus summo[25][n]ed is the gre[at Jud]ge, who gives judgement on all the souls / [of] mankind, [his] dwelling being established in the atmosphere under [... / ...] wheel [...] stars.

The third power is / [the Y]outh, the gre[at ...] light in his two pers/ons, in [...], I am speaking about that which has been established [30] [i]n the summons [and] the obedience. [He] too [stood] with his fa[ther / the] king [...] the savio[ur ...] seen, as he tells / [...] I, what I have seen with my Father, / [I tell to] you. For yourselves, what you have seen / [with your fath]er, do that*[14].

(36) The fourth father is the Light Mind, the one who chooses all the / churches. And, again, he too summoned three / powers after the pattern of Jesus.

The first power is the Apostle / of Light; the one who shall on occasion come and assume the chur[5]ch of the flesh, of humanity; and he becomes inner leader of ri/ghteousness.

The second is the counterpart, who shall come to the apo/stle and appear to him, becoming companion to him, / sticking close to him everywhere; and providing help to him all the time, from / all afflictions and dangers.

The third [10] is the Light Form; the one whom the elect and the ca/techumens shall receive, should they renounce the world. /

And also the fifth father is this Light Form; the one who / shall appear to everyone who will g[o] out from his bo/dy, corresponding to the pattern of the image to the apostle; and the thr[ee] [15] great glorious angels who are come with her.

One (angel) ho[ld]/s the prize in his hand. The second bears the light garment. / The third is the one who possesses the diadem / and the wreath and the crown of light. These are the thr/ee angels of light, the ones who shall come with this Light Form; [20] and they appear with her to the elect and the / catechumens.

These are the five fathers who have come out / of one another. They have appeared and man[ifes]ted through one ano/ther!

/ Concerning the Fourteen Vehicles / that Jesus has boarded. /

The fourteen vehicles correspond to the stations through which Jesus passes as he descends deeper into matter for the purpose of salvation; and to the divine elements that he assumes and thus sanctifies in this descent. The listing of the ten 'carriages in the zone' reverses an order most familiar in accounts of the ascent of the light elements, the qualities of the living soul, as they pass through the redemptive process of summons and obedience, and finally ascend perfected from the Pillar to the moon and thence to the sun (see 71).

[30] Once again, the light-man speaks to the congregati[on that] is sitting in front of / him: When Jesus the son of greatness [came] to these world[s], / at the time that he unveiled the greatness, [he boarded ten] / vehicles! He journeyed in the universe [by them]. /

The first vehicle is the ligh[t] ship, [since] [35] he received instructions from the Ambassador [there].

(37) The second carriage is the ship of the First Man, sin/ce his dwelling is established there. /

The third is the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man, sin/ce he shone forth there. He came below, he appeared in the wo[5]rld.

The fourth is the summons that he clothed / upon his body. The fifth is the obedience that he swathed / upon the summons.

The sixth is the living air, and since / he assumed it too, he received anointment there. / The seventh is the living wind that blows. The eighth [10] is the light that illuminates. The ninth is the living w/ater. The tenth is the living fire that is above them all. /

He was journeying in these ten carriages among all the orders and / all the [...], those above and those below. /

After he had assumed these ten, he came and manifested in the [15] flesh. He chose the holy church in four vehic/les. One is all the holy brothers. The second is the / pure sisters. The third is all the catechumens, / the sons of the faith. The fourth is the catechu/-mens, the daughters of the light and truth.

These ten carria[20]ges that he boarded in the zone, and the other four that are in the flesh, / they complete and make fourteen carriages! He has done in them / the pleasure of his Father. He has made alive, has redeemed, and given the victory to / [th]ese who are his. Conversely, [h]e has killed, bound, and destroyed / they who are strangers to him. He has given glory to the Father who sent him, [25] and the entire kingdom of life. Blessed is he who will k/now these mysteries; for he will count to the portion of Jesus, / the son of greatness.

/ The Explanation of the Peace, what it is; [30] the Ri[gh]t Hand; the Kiss; the Salutation. /

The ritual actions that occur in human society, and which Mani has instituted in his church, are presented as reenactments of divine archetypes. Mani's lesson is carefully structured, and provides many important details and insights into Manichaean doctrine and church practice.

38.13 – 39.9 The descent of the First Man from the land of light was a favourite theme. Full of the pathos of loss and estrangement, it is in a very real sense the story of each soul. Thus, this text makes much of the familial love and care within the divine household.

39.10 – 40.19 Once the sacrifice of the First Man has been achieved, he is saved by the Living Spirit and returns to the kingdom. This establishes and sanctifies the process of redemption; and, while it occurs at the beginning of the history, it also anticipates the triumphant return at the end of time of the collectivity of the divine, with the First Man at their head, to enter the new aeon.

40.24 – 41.10 Now that the primordial archetypes have been established, Mani immediately relates them to the individual's experience and the practice of the church.

41.11 – 25 Mani then utilises the symbols to focus on the glorious hope offered to the victorious soul, when it meets the Light Form and receives its prizes.

41.26 – 42.23 The lesson ends with the injunction to its hearers to honour and practice this divine teaching.

[O]nce again the disciples questioned the apostle, saying / [to him]: This peace and this greeting that occur in the world, / [from w]hom [did they come fo]rth? Or likewise, the right hand that occurs in / [the world, it being h]onoured by mankind, of whom is it? Or the my[35][stery of the ki]ss that they embrace one another with, / [...]? Or who is the one that reveals this (38) salutation with which they make obeisance to one another? Or this laying on of h/ands, which an immensely great one bequeaths upon his inferior, / giving him an honour and making him great; of / whom is this laying on of hands?

Then he says to his disciples: [5] You have questioned me about these five lessons. Now, they are display/ed in the world as miniatures, being made little; / and yet indeed they are great and honoured. I am the one who can reveal to y/ou their mystery! So, these five signs / are the mystery of the First Man. He came forth wit[10]h them from the aeon of light. Also, when he finished / his contest, he went up with these good signs. / They received him into the aeons of light. /

The first peace is the one that the gods and the [an]gels in the land / of light gave to the First Man; when he comes [15] out against the enemy. The gods and the angels / were walking with him; escorting him, giving to him their peace and / power, and their blessing and fortification. This is the first / peace that the gods and the angels gave to the First / Man; as he comes forth from the aeon of light.

[20] The first right hand is the one that the Mother of Life gave to the First Ma/n; when he comes out to the contest. /

The first kiss is this one with which the Moth[er] of Life embrac/ed the First Man; as he separates from her, coming / down to the contest. Even all the gods and the [an][25]gels who are in the aeons of light were making to em[br]ace him! [...] / all of them also, and the church tutelaries (?), and the kinsf[olk w]/ho belong to the household of his people. They were making to embrace him as [he] / separates from them, accompanying him out, em[bracing] / him with the kiss of affection and love.

30 The first salutation is the salutation with which the F[ir]st Ma[n] / made obeisance; when he comes ou[t to the depths] / below. He was bending his kn[ees, making obeisance] / to the God of truth, and all the aeons [of light] (39) who belong to the household of his people; entreating them for a power to / escort him*15, as he comes forth. /

The first laying on of hands is the one that the Mother of Life bequeathed upon / the head of the First Man. She armed him and made him 5 mighty. She laid hands on him, and sent him to the battle. He des/cended. He completed his struggle with the great powers and the en/mity.

By the[se] five signs and these five myst[e]ri/es the First Man came forth from the aeons of light / against the enemy. He humbled him. He was victorious against him by [th]em.

10 Also, when he ascended from the w[a]r, he came i[n] / to the kingdom of the household of his people by these five mysteri/es!

The peace with which h[e ascen]ded is the peace that the / summons gave to him, [w]hen it was sent forth from the [Fa]ther of L/ife. It gave him the peace in the world of darkness. 15 Also, that peace with which he descended is th/[e sam]e as the one with which he ascended from the struggle! Therefore, appropriate to the my/[s]tery of that peace, which the summons gave / the First Man, did this peace here and now come about. / It was named and heard among the powers of the Father.

Again, this 20 second right hand is the one that the Living Spirit gave the First / Man, when he [brou]ght him upward out from the struggle. Appropriate to / [the] mystery [of t]hat right hand this right hand has come about; / the one that occurs in the [midst of] mankind, as they give it to their companions, / [it b]eing honoured and [...]

*15 Perhaps the angel Nahashbat referred to in the account of Theodore bar Konai Lib Schol. XI.

Also, this second ki[25][s]s is the one with which the [Father o]f Life and the Mother of the living / embraced the F[irst] Man, when he ascended / from the struggle. Again, this kiss occurs among / mankind, as they make to embrace their companions with it; whether then [they] / go away from home and be far from their friends, or else [30] [if] they approach one another, according to the mystery of (the First Man). /

[The] second [s]alutation with which the First Man made obeisance / [... this] time to the God of truth and / [...] the blessed aeons and al[l] the aeons / [... the] whole [land] of light, whe[n] (40) the Father of Life and the Mother of the living brought / the Man upward from the abyss of the struggle. Appropriate to the myste/ry of the second salutation this salutation has come about; this one / that occurs today in the midst of mankind, as they make obeisance to one [5] another, doing an honour to their companions.

The second / laying on of hands is this: When the Living Spirit brought the First / Man upward from the war, he saved him from / all the surging waves. He brought him upward, he gave him ease in the great / aeons of light, which belong to the household of his people. [10] He set [him] firmly before the Father, the Lord of the totality. / Now, when he went up before the great Father of the / lights, a voice came forth to him from the heights, saying: / Make my son, my first-born, to sit at my right hand side, until I / set all his enemies for a footstool under his feet.*[16] [15] He received this great laying on of hands that he may become leader / of his brethren in the new aeon. Again, appropriate to the myster/y of the second laying on of hands, this laying on of hands has come / about; the one that occurs in the midst of mankind as they lay hands on one / another, the great giving authority to the lesser.

These five myste[20]ries and these five signs came about first in the divi/ne. They were proclaimed in this world by an [a]postle. Ma[nk]/ind has been taught them; and they have instituted them in their mids[t ... but] these myster[ies] wer[e] / not at the beginning amongst the / powers of darkness.

First, before / everything else, he chooses his church with peace. / And he gives the peace first to mankind; so that the person receives / the peace, and becomes a child of peace. Afterwards he is elected [30] to the faith. Now, when he may receive the peace, he shall receive [the rig]/ht hand and count to the right hand. When they / will receive the peace and the right hand, the kiss and the salutation, [5] the last of these things shall be bequeathed upon them from the right hand of charity. They / too [receive] the laying on of hands, which will be bequeathed upon them. A/nd they are conformed and built up in the truth, and made strong in it for eve/r. They shall come in to the Light Mind with these good signs; / and become fulfilled people. They make obeisance and [10] [give] glory to the God of truth. /

[On]ce again: At the time of their coming forth, the Light Form / shall come forth before them; and she redeems them from the darkness to the li/ght [...] This Light Form calms the per/son, with the kiss and her quiet, from fear of the [15] demons w[ho de]-stroy his body. By her asp[ec]t and her im/age [the] heart of the elect one, who is come forth from his bo/[d]y, shal[l] be calm for [him]. Afterwards, the angel who h[o]lds the victo/ry prize extends to him the right hand. And it draws him out of / the abyss of his body, and accepts him in with the [k]iss [20] and love. That soul shall make obeisan[ce] to its red/eemer, who is this Light Form. And also, at the inst[ant / when ...] he shall be perfected and increased according to [... / ...] in the household of the living ones, with the go/[ds] and the angel[s] and all the apostles and the chosen. [25] [An]d he receives the crown [...] glory in the life for ever. /

[Concern]ing this I tell you, my brethren and my limbs: / [L]et you (sg.) find these fi[ve signs] in your hands, honoured before / [ea]ch one of [yo]u. They are: the peace; the right hand; the k/[i]ss; the sa[luta]tion; and the laying on of hands. Therefore, le/t them find this laying on of hands being esteemed in your presence; as you give / honour, and make obeisance to the teachers and the deacons and the presby[5]ters, they whom I have laid hands on. I have bequeathed upon them the great / laying on of hands; because they are set in a great myste/[r]y, the laying on of hands of the divine, which is bequeathed upon the h/ead of the teacher. Now, whoever will reject and dis[da]in i/t, and it is made nothing by him: he commits sin subject to God, with gre[at] [10] sin; and also against me too. /

[25] Concerning the Interpretation of the Fourteen [great A]eons, / about which Sethel has spoken in [his P]rayer. /

Mani regarded Seth as the first in the line of true apostles (12.9 – 11); and the various references to him in Manichaean texts show some dependence upon prior gnostic traditions. The Cologne Mani-Codex quotes from an unknown apocalypse of Seth (pp. 50 – 52). The question about the prayer of Seth in this kephalaion may well indicate such a tradition.

However, Mani provides his own interpretation consistent with his revealed teaching. The fourteen great aeons of light are: the five elements or sons of the First Man; the call and the hearing; the five sons of the Living Spirit; the two respective fathers. The fragmentary final section (43.10 - 21) seems to indicate that these fourteen underpin the visible universe; and that the Ambassador, as the principal god of redemption, has become their leader and king after the image of the first eternal Father.

Once again the disciples question the apostle. They sa[y] to him: We be[seech] / you, our master, that you may enlighten us a[bou]t this lesson that is wr[itten / in] the prayer of Sethel, the first-born son of [Ad]am. [20] *Concerning the Interpretation of the Five Words that are / proclaimed {} 17 / in the Univer[se]. /

These five words appear to be the divine names used by other sects. Mani explains their significance by equating them with the appropriate Manichaean divinities. Mani was himself brought up in an Elchasaite community; and the Kephalaia makes a number of references to contemporary groups such as Baptists, Nazoreans, and Purified Ones (Catharioi). However, the exact identity of and relationship between these diverse Jewish-Christian sects remains unclear. The First and the Second Life are characteristic Mandaean terms.

/ [Concerning the ... / ...] Five [Parts ...] [25] Worlds of [...] /

The disciples ask Mani why the realm of darkness became active and death streamed forth against the light. Mani explains that the driving force is fire and lust, charged by the doubling of the evil pentad (five elements, worlds, categories of creation or flesh) into male and female. Thus there are twelve parts (5 x 2 + fire and lust) ; corresponding to the zodiacal signs and the spirits of the evil sects.

[O nce again, the enlighten]er is sitting in the midst of his discipl[es, / explaining to them about] the great and secret matters of Go[d / ... the] two ess[e]nces. (49,10 – 55,15)

/ [Concerning the Five] Greatnesses who / [went forth] against the Darkness. /

49.15 – 31 Four of the 'greatnesses' are the Father himself and the standard three series of emanations (corresponding to descent, creation, and ascent). Interestingly, Jesus the Splendour (and his powers) is given a separate place as the fifth greatness, which may be a later development of Manichaean doctrine that attempts to regulate the increasingly dominant role of this god.

49.31 – 50.6 The text remarks on the characteristic pentads of the doctrine; and then notes, in an undoubtedly forced calculation, that together with the summons and the obedience twelve major gods (not counting the series of five sons) can be counted.

50.7 – 55.15 The major part of the chapter is in effect a separate and unrelated kephalaion concerned with the advent of five divinities. The role of each is given a useful summary, and Mani develops similes to aid his hearers' understanding.

[O]nce again the enlightene]r [speaks] to his disciples: / [... the] darkness, it was defeated by five greatnesses.

[15] [The first gre]atness is the Father of Greatness who [exi/sts] in c]alm and hiddeness; as he is established in his [light] / earth, in his own essence.

Four greatnesses were mani/[feste]d and came forth of him. They were appointed to ten parts, and estab/lished in total twelve.

The second gr[20]eatness poured out and was manifested. It was revealed from the first / greatness. It is the Mother of Life, the Great Spirit. Together with / the First Man [and his] five sons; [these are the second / great]ness.

The third [greatness is the Bel/oved of the L]ights, the Great Builder, the Living Spirit, and the five [s]o[25][ns] of the Living Spirit. These are the third greatness. /

[The fou]rth greatness is the Third Ambassador, and / [the P]illar of Glory, and all the light powers who were revealed / [from him. These are the] fourth greatness. /

[The fi]fth greatne[ss] who came from the Father is Jesus the Splendour, and [30] all [h]is powers whom he summoned, his emanations who were [... / They] poured out and were manifested from him.

This is, so that they were [spre]ad out and / [...] five[s]: these five sons of the First Ma/[n ...] the entire building; another five are the five / [sons of the Living Spirit] who are spread out to five places, supporting [35] [...]

[...] total in tw(50)elve parts that [... There are] another two [ad]/ded to them who are the summons and [the obedien]ce. They are the father and the mother whom Jesus the Sp[lendour] by his advent has [appointed] / as successors to his place [...] the great earth [5] and the [... / ...] in them. /

[The advent ...] / of the First Man who came [... / ... [10] ...] belonging to [...] / ex[isting i]n a kingdom [...] / esteem [befo]re they who belong to his [household ... / ... / ...] his enemies [...] [15] and suffering by their wickedness; and they take from him [...] / and a richness; and they imprison [him in] / captivity and take from him their companies (?). Yet, h[e ...] / by his humility; and he takes heart and restrains his en[emy / ...] in silence.

Just as with this man, this noble [20] son whose enemies surround him; this also / is how the advent of the First Man happened, / [... rul]ers, the enemies of [the l]ight. /

In contrast, the advent of the Living Spirit and the [comman]dment that he received, / whereby [he] came upon all the rulers; it differs from that of the [25] First Man. His adv[ent ...] the advent of the F[irst] / M[an].

The advent of the Living Spirit is lik[e] / this, when he was sent from the greatness that he might br[ing] / up the First Man. He resembles a [ju]/dge the king would send to overturn the violence to [30] that man, the noble son against whom his enem[ies] / sinned. And he, this [judge, ...] / hard and cruel [... / ...] and he gives the means [... by his right] (51)eousness and his st[rengt]h; and he also judges all who / are condemned according to their rebellious heart, and re/pays each according to his deserts. They who are worthy of / blows he strikes with hard leather whips. Again, these [5] who are worthy of cutting off their limbs, or indeed their / [...] and he repays them accordingly. / [...] and he binds and fetters them, and hangs by / [...] and thus he does to them with a / [righteous] judgement. And he kills them to flay their skin [10] [...] so that they will be killed by a death / [...] until they die. Again, [they for] whom it is fitting / [...] to banish from their dwellings he may / [remove according to] a righteous judgement; just as they had faulted / [and sinned against] the noble son. Also, the associates in the mystery [15] [and the assis]tants of this judge, these who belong to / [him in] great strength; in an instant and / [h]aste they shall do the will of their master. /

Now, just as this genuine judge, who was sent f/rom the king to overturn the violence to this man, the [20] noble s[o]n; this is also the case with the Living Spirit. / He also was sent from the King of the lights / [to] over[turn] the vengeance [a]nd violence to the First Man, / against whom the King of the realms of Darkness had sinned. He faulted / [and] sinned against him, and also his rebellious powers. [Therefo]re, when (the Living Spirit) came, [25] he bore up the First Man.

Also, a[l]l the rulers, / the powers of sin who had faulted and sinned against the sons / [of] the First Man, he has judged them according to a right[e]ous judgement. / He has bound them in heaven and earth. He put each one / to the place fitting for him, he weighed each of them [30] [acco]rding to his c[ru]elty and oppression. [While] some [of] the[m] he enclosed in / [the prison, ot]hers he hung head down. Som/[e ...] are crucified, others are (52) sat down all the time. Some among them are fixed be/neath their associates, restricted by a strong chain; / others he made the holders of authority over their companions / beneath, so that they may do their pleas[5]ure amongst these below them. /

Happen you know this [...] that w[h]e[n] / the Father of Life established the judgements [...] / He was revealed to all the powers o[f darkness. He] / judged them as a [true] giver of judgement [... [10] ... / This] is the first judgement that the [Living] Spirit [gave] / the rulers [in respect of the] First Man. [Indeed, he] gave victory to the [First Man] / corresponding to his victory; [but] he condemned the [King of the realms of Darkness] / corresponding to that [by] which he had erred.

[... [15] ...] this chain, of this sort, became [...] / the earth till the en[d] time when the [universe] will be dissolved; / and it perishes in the great fire and is separated. While [the li]/ght goes to its country, the darkness remains in / [the chain] and fetter for ever.

[20] The advent also of the Third Ambassador, when he came / [to inspect] they who are imprisoned in the zone. He is / like a great king who comes and inspects cra[f/tsmen ...] and [...] and [... / ...] Also, they who are good, of the craftsmen and archi[te][25]cts and artisans whom he has there in ea[ch] / place; he shall see that [th]ey have worked well, / and have fallen to his works in their fashion. He shall rejoice with / [great joy ...] He shall thank the artisans / who have constructed his works [and completed] his orders.

[30] Now, just as this great king w[ho c]omes and insp[e]/cts his works and fortific[ation]s; so a[lso] / is the advent of the Third Amb[assa]dor. [F]o/r, when he too came, he saw [his works] / established and prepared and [...] (53) series of the rulers prepared and established there; / above and below, outside and w/ithin, in the great pattern that his brothers had made. / They had come before him to the contest, they who had fixed and cre[5]ated the universe before he came. He saw the gods and the / a[ng]els est[abl]ished and controlling the fortifi/[cations ...] guarding the [ent]ire ruling-power [... / ...] which his first powe[rs] had done. / [They are the F]irst Man and the [Living Spirit]; [10] a[nd the] Great [Spirit, the M]other of Life.

Therefore, when h[e s]aw / them, that they had [created] everything [with] great wisdom; / [...] as they looked he plundered (?) [... / ...] in h[is adve]nt, by which he came, he was un[veil]ed / to [them]. He says to the Living Spirit: 'The judgement that [you] have [... 15 ...] good, what you utt[ered ...] / you [gave to] them correspondingly; so that they were moved and raised up to that of w/h[ich t]hey were not worthy'. /

[The] advent also of Jesus the Splendour, the time when he came to [a]ll [...] / being just like a man if he is [se20n]t to pull out a [... / b]urn a difficult f[ig]-garden with fire. Therefore, [aga]in, / when he has [fi]rst cu[t] the bad trees with his a/[x]e and has pulled out [... / ...] and their body with his fire; so that they should not return to sprout 25 [from] this time, no[r] bear fruit bad to eat / [...] Afterwards, [he] also planted [good] plants; [the / t]ree of lif[e] that will make good fruit. /

Again, this is [like] this simile of the advent of Jesus the Splendour. / [It] happened l[ike this]; because he too set out 30 [... h]is power and his wisdom, in his / [...]-ness [... a] king and a saviour / [...] in his glorious wisdom (54) he destroyed them. He bound and crushed them like / the fire that shall burn and destroy trees. This is also how / he performed his will in the zone, / among the many powers; until he reached the form 5 of the flesh of Adam and Eve, the first humans. [He perfected] / his will in Eve, he [... He a]lso [gave / h]ope to Adam, and the g[ood] news [...] / glorious [...] He went up to [the heights ... / ... of li]ght.

T[hen the summons and the obed]10ience, the great counsel that came [to] the el[emen]ts, / which are set in conjunction. It [mixed w]ith them, i[t was es]tabl/ished [i]n silence. It bears u[p ...] un[til the end t]i/me when it can arise and stand f[ir]m in the g[reat] fi/re. It will gather to it its own soul, and sc[ul]p15t it in the Last Sta[t]ue. You will a[ls]o find it / sweeps out and casts from it the polluti[on] / that is foreign to it. However, the life and the li[gh]t / that are in all things it gathers in to it, and builds / upon its body. The time when this Last Statue 20 will be perfect in all its limbs, then it can become free / and ascend from that great struggle thr[ough] / the Living Spirit its father, the one who comes and brings a [... l]/imb. He brings it up from within this gathering(?), the melting do[wn] / and destruction of all things.

Now, th[is co]25unsel, tha[t] summons <and> obedience, resembles / thus cooled butter. If a pers[o]n will take an[d s/e]t it in hot milk, it melts [dow]n and soak[s] / in with this hot milk. It m[elts] in another [time / i]n silence and quiet to the mids[t ...] yet also, of the power and the taste of this m[ilk ...] / is drawn to (the butter), and (the milk) sets and becomes [cold ...] / in [...] and the ... this milk it shall clarify and discard. However, the oil and the grea/se and the 'beauty' of the [m]ilk it shall gather in to it. /

Again, this too is what the advent of / that thought is like; the counsel of life, which is the summons and [o]bedience that came to the el[e]ments. / This is the one that at the end c[an a]rise and stand firm, and will gather / [i]n to it all [the] lives, a[nd] the light that has / [remai]ned behind [in] everything. It can bui[ld] them upon / [it]s body, it will [gath]er them in to it [... ... ...] in its im[ag]e for ever and ever [... / ...] from this time.

B[l]essed is / every one w[ho will be]lieve in these five advents and [b]e confir[med / in the] knowledge. [He will come to] the heights and be saved [... / ...] and not be counted [... ...]

/ The Chapter of the / Thr[ee] Seasons. /

Manichaeism designated itself as the religion 'of the two principles and the three times (or seasons)'. The two principles are light and darkness; and the three times are the beginning, the middle and the end.

In Manichaean tradition there are two primary ways of delineating the three times. Often the whole of history, the time of mixture, is encapsulated in the middle period between the twin eternities before and after its events. Alternatively, as in this kephalaion, the history itself is separated into three: descent, creation, redemption.

It is notable that the primeval events when the First Man is in the land of darkness, before the construction of the universe, cover the longest span. In contrast, the entirety of human history, from the fashioning of Adam and Eve 'after the image of God (the Ambassador)' to the final redemption, occurs in the third period. Thus, it is all eschatological.

O[n]ce again the apostle speaks to his disciples: Fr[om] the time when the light came forth and was crucified in the darkness; / [t]o the season when the Statue will ascend an[d] / the entire light, w[hic]h was conjoined with the darkness, will be puri[fied] and c[lean/sed]. He [s]ays: [Fr]om that time on, [from tha]t time / to the season of the end totals three seasons.

[25] [Thre]e season[s from] the time when the First Man / [went] down to the abyss, and waged the war and the struggle / [against] the King of the realms of [Dark]ness and his other powers. He was victorious, / [whi]le h[is sons remain behi]nd with them in the worlds [... / ...] in the [...] until he shall catch all of them [30] [... he bou]nd them all up, so that not one o[f / them escaped] his hand. He won a great victory [... / ... The First] Man spent human lifetimes and / [generations in the land] of darkness, until he prevailed / [...] (56) he fulfilled the will of the greatness that was [commanded] / of him.

Then they sent the Living Spirit, the Father [o]f / Life. He brought the First Man up from the struggle, he / [brought him up to the] land of light. This is the first [5] peri[o]d, from the descen[t] of the First Man / to his ascent. /

The second seas[o]n is from the time [when the F]irst [Ma]/n ascen[d]ed. The Living Spirit came, an[d the] Mother of [Life. / They set in order the th]ings o[f] the univer[se, they] set u[p [10] ... the Father of] / Life [an]d the Mother of the living set in order [... / ...] the u[n]iverse, up to the moment when they go out / [...] it was reckoned to the second season. /

[...] the universe [... [15] ...] the Third Ambassador spread [... / ...] that is in the [...] living; he [... / he separated] beauty from all the powers and scooped [it up] / to the heights, he swept the waste to the abyss, and he [... / ...] Now, from the moment when the Ambassador revealed [20] his image he purified the light. Sin spur[ted] / up towards him. He hid his image. Sin came / [...] from [the dark]ness. It sculpted the trees and the abortion[s fe/l]l down. Afterwards they sculpted Adam a[nd Eve] / in the flesh. Until the moment when Jesus wa[s se]nt and he [... [25] ...] as he performed there h[is w]ill. He gave the [hop]/e to Adam, and ascended to the heig[hts]. /

Now, from the time when the Ambassador [displayed] his

ima[ge] / until the season when [the Sta]tue will [as]/cend at the end, shall be reckoned to the t[hird sea]son.

30 T[hen] the disciples asked the apost[le ... / ...] / with each other in the ligh[t] earth [... / ...

The apost]/le says to them [... (57) ... / ...] lasts long in the time t[hat the] First [Man spent in the wo]/rld of darkness. It is a very great count [of t]ime [more] / than the (other) two seasons!

His discipl[e]s say to h[im: The] 5 first season, wh[ic]h the First Man spent in the [world of] dark/ness, is how mu[ch] longer than the time that this univer[se has been? While it is / es]tablished?

[He replies to them]: If you should say th[at ... / ...] it is small, if y[ou] sho[uld ... / ...] to him [...] and [y]ou consult [... 10 ...] you will tel[l] him: Twe[nty times]! / [It is grea]ter again in this other one that you will c[onsult]. / Th[ir]ty times! Less also is this other o[ne ... / ...] people will receive the {}*19 of the trees [... / ...] the years and the generations [... 15...] earth to the heights. This is [...

This / is] the third period, from the time w[hen the Ambassa/d]or revealed his image until the [S]tatue will asc/end from the lump. It again, th[at] time, is / greater than the intermediate; but it does not come equal to the ti20[me of the Firs]t Man. For this intermediate season, / in [which] the Father of Life and the Mother of Life [constructed the un/ivers]e with its orders, is shorter than that of the First / [Ma]n.

Gr[ea]t [i]s the period of the First Ma/[n]! It lasts longer than the season in which the Ambassador disp25[l]ayed his image, until the dissolution of / [the] world and [the S]tatue ascends. [From the time / to]o when the Ambassador displayed his image, until / [the dis]solution of the universe [... / ... 30 ...] when the Father of Life and the / [Mother of Life s]haped the universe.

These are the / [... thre]e periods of time that o[ccur]. (58)

/ [Concerning the Five] War[s that the] Sons / of [Li]ght waged wi[th the Sons] of Darkness. /

Five major cosmological events in the history are, in sequence, presented as wars in which principal divinities have vanquished the powers of darkness.

58.7 – 19 The descent of the First Man who sacrifices his five sons, the living soul. While this is sometimes presented as a primal tragedy, like the crucifixion it is the bait that ensures the defeat of death.

58.20 – 59.2 The creative activity of the Living Spirit who imprisons the rulers in the universe.

59.3 – 18 The displaying of the divine image by the Third Ambassador who seduces the demons chained in the heavens, thereby drawing out of them their light. Mani develops a short parable to explain this crucial moment.

59.19 – 28 The descent of Jesus the Splendour who subdues a rebellion by evil (see 93.29 – 94.11) and imparts knowledge to Adam.

59.29 – 60.8? Perhaps the eschatological work of the counsel of life that sculpts the Last Statue upon itself, achieving the final victory and redemption (see 81.1 – 6)?

[T]hen] the enlightener [s]peak[s]: The sons of light waged five [war]s against the sons of darkness. The sons of light / [humiliated the s]ons of darkness in them all. /

[The first w]ar is that of the First living [M]an, which [he / waged against the] King of the realms of Darkness, an[d] all the rule[r]s that had come / [forth from] the five worlds of [...] He hunte[d them with] his net, which is [the] living soul. / Concerning the Five Re[le]as[es; [15] what] they [are]. /

These five 'releases', or moments and processes in the redemption of the light, correspond to the five wars in the previous chapter.

[Once again] our father [s]peaks: [There are] five [releases / by] which the light is saved f[rom] / all [the rulers and] powers of darkness! /

[The first loo]sening and saving is that of [the] First Ma[20]n, since when the First M[a]n was freed fro[m / the prison of] the rulers by the Living Spirit, who had come [... / ...] / of the First Man, much light and [much] power was / saved from the entire ruling-power. [20] The Chapter of / the Name of the Fathers. /

The name 'father', as the Father of Greatness, supremely designates the ultimate God and source of all divinity. However, it can also properly be used of the derived gods in their own realms of greatness. Compare chapters 7 and 25.

[On]ce again the enlightener speaks to his disciples: The [Father / of] Greatness, as he is named; due to what reason is he given the name 'the Father / [of] Greatness'?

His disci[25][p]les say to him: We beseech you, our master, that you may enlighte/n us about this [g]reatness; for who is it that is named / 'the Father o[f G]reatness'?

Then he speaks / [to] his disciples: Now, the Father, who is the first esta/[b]lished thing, [shall be cal]led 'the Father of Greatness'. [30] His greatn[ess is the gr]eat earth where he lives, he being established / [i]n it [...] the essence of the light that swathes / all the [r]ich go[d]s and the angels and the dwellings / [...] is set over it. /

[Furthermore, they shall c]all the Third Ambassador [35] ['father'. His greatness i]s the light ship of living fire (64) [wherein he lives], he being established in it. /

[Once again, J]esus the Splendour shall himself also be called 'father'. / His [greatn]ess is the ship of living waters where he lives, / [he being established in it].

/ [...] [30] which [...] /

Mani begins by telling his disciples that no one can explain the ultimate origin of the two eternal kingdoms, for no prior power has been revealed (66.31 – 67.20). However, the apostle can preach about the time from when the darkness first stirred against the light, to attack it. Thus begins the history of war and conflict (67.20 – 30).

The essence of darkness stirred into the thought of death, and spread and generated the hideous warring powers through its five elemental worlds. These are the five trees that bear evil fruit (67.31 – 68.28). The chief ruler then took charge of his powers; and, noticing the light, conspired to attack (68.29 – 32 and ff.).

The Father of Greatness knows that death can not be allowed to intrude into the eternal land of light; and thus must emanate the gods to take the conflict to the darkness and into the arena of mixture. The plan that will ensure ultimate victory is entrusted to the living soul (the five sons of the First Man), for it will destroy evil from within, using that uncontollable lust that is at the heart of death. Therefore, the First Man puts on his sons as garments, or as armour in preparation for the war (68.33 – 70.7).

This chapter is concerned with the measurement of time and eternity; and consequently with the question of why apostles can speak of certain episodes in the history, but not of those others that are eternal. In this it is linked to the opening question of the previous kephalaion. Chapter 24 appears also to be composite, with series of textual material loosely strung together on these related themes.

70.12 – 72.27 The duration and process of emanating the Great Spirit, the First Man, and his five sons; from the Father. It is notable that the Mother of Life is in part distinguished here from the Great Spirit (71.25) who comes into existence prior as the female archetype of the divine.

72.28 – 73.3 The other gods were also emanated at the same time.

73.4 – 74.9 Apostles can speak of the middle time, the history of descent and ascent; because it is temporal in contrast to the twin eternities of the beginning and the end.

74.9 – 75.10 The parallel process of evil emanation from Matter.

75.11 – 76.3 A list of six related points; but the exact context is unclear.

76.4 – 14 Reiteration of the theme about time and eternity.

grains of the entire universe; / but the duration of the time that the Great Spirit spent in the Father, [the] / first established thing, one will not be able to make a count of it!

He first / sculpted her like this. He established her in his inner storehous[es] [30] in quiet and silen[c]e. When [they had] / need of her she was called and came forth of the Father [of Greatness]. / She looked at all her aeons of lig[ht]!

Once again, from the time when she was called to [...] (71) go to [...] she gave [...] / upon his [bod]y [...] al[l] the aeons [...]; / she also [...] all of them. This [is also the case] / with the First Man.

This is how the Man [5] spent a long time being anointed in the Mother, set fast in her / inner storehouses [...] the extent of time that I have rec[ounted] / to you; from when the First Man went d[own to] / the contest, till the time when the [Statue (?) co]mes i[n ...] / this time [... [10] ...] he appeared [... / ...]

Ag[ain], from when he was / [c]alled and came forth, till the time when he [himse]lf call[ed / the five] shining [gods] who are his sons; they / themsel[ves also spent a long] time existing in their father! [15] I[t is the ti]me that occured from the coming down of the Fi/[rst Man] till the going up of the Last Statue. The f/[ive god]s spent this much duration being anointed in the First Man. / Yet, [at the] t[i]me when they were awaited, they were called and came [f]orth. /

Listen also to this, how I would teach you it. At the [20] time when the Mother of Life was called from the Father of Greatness, / when she expelled herself and came down by her [o]wn [wish], / from the heights of the Father to the earth, [she would spend / thousands of] years and many ten thousands until she reached the earth. / [Fo]r there is no measure nor rule to the heights of the Father. Rather, [just as] [25] he had called her in his Great Spirit, so he set her upon / [the] land of greatness thr[ou]gh one of these three that are counted to the twe/[lv]e hidden ones withi[n] the light veil, the ones / [esta]blished after the [...] region of the south. /

[The] matter of the Mother [of L]ife is like this. When [30] [the Fath]er called her he established her in the place he pleased, /

[to] establish her there as the instruction of the people that / [...] many [...]; and she examined everywhere that / [...] a blink of an eye, or like a (72) [...] bir[d ... / ...] This also is lik[e / ... the] Mother of Life in [...] whenever / [...] cast her out [... u]pon her to the place [... 5 ...] him. He perfected her in his Great Spirit and set her in / [the place he pl]eased, according to [his wi]ll. /

[Th]is [also is how] they called the [five g]ods from the [Fi/rst Man. They were se]t befo[re him], as he wished that [... / ... 10 ... / ... / ... / ...]-ness [...] / down, that they would rule in them [...] 15 one another. He ordered and distributed them [... / ...] the son. He stripped himself of them [...] and he [... / ...] he girt and bound himself to [...] / in a [...] of silence upon the border of the earth [... A]/gain, he too, the First Man, spent a long period and [time] 20 until he gave power to his sons; until he assu[m]/ed them. After he came to wear them he stood fast in the hei/ghts between the borders. Again, he spent a duration and ti/[me] like this, corresponding to such amount and measure as the rain/drops and dew and falls of mist that come down in 25 the universe. This is how he spent this duration also, [stand]/ing between the borders, until the hour when he cast himself [d]/own to the contest! /

Whenever the Father of Greatn[e]ss [calle]d the Great Spir[it] / and the First Man and the gods [of] the glorious one, who are provide[d to] 30 enable them to reveal him; at that ve[ry ti]me [he] / sculpted the Great Builder in the [land of] light, [and] / the Living Spirit with the might[y] and active gods who came [from] / him. Also, at that time, he sculpted the [Amb]/assador, with Jesus the Splendour and the Vi[r]gi[n] of Lig[ht] 35 and the Pillar of Glory, and the gods who [came from them. (73) All these the Father of Greatness sculpted at] / a single time. They came for[th of] one another, one after on/e; the time when [...] and the work./

/ Concerning the First Man and the Ambassa/dor and the Ship; what they resemble. /

Mani frequently used parables and similes in his teaching. However, the miscellaneous set of five in this kephalaion have little coherence beyond the concept of redemption. Their collection here evidences that the original contexts have been lost during a period of textual transmission.

76.29 – 34 The First Man rescues his treasure, his sons (the living soul), from the powers of darkness.

76.34 – 77.3 The significance of the two sons (usually five) and the two powers is unclear.

77.4 – 7 The Great Spirit has its throne in the sun (see 82.30 – 31); and its role is to beautify and to set matters in order (see 79.29 – 30 102.27).

*30 ⲧⲘⲏⲧⲉ

77.8 – 10 The Living Spirit redeems the First Man.
77.11 – 16 The Third Ambassador is the principal god of redemption. The living soul is continually reborn in the material forms in which it is imprisoned.

Once again he speaks: The First [Man] is like a grea[t] distinguished man wh[ose treasu]re has been taken away from him. H[e came] / to pursue his treasure. This [is] how the [First] / Man too came after his sons [f]rom the heights, [so that he] / might redeem*[31] them and retrieve his treasure, which had been scattered among[st] / his enemies.

Once again, [he is like a man] whose two sons were taken away from him by [... He] / came out toward them to redeem them. [Again, this is how (77) the F]irst Man [...] shines in the heights because of h[is] / two sons, who were separa[t]ed from him. They are his / living soul that exist in two powers, which makes four. /

[Once] again, the ship [of the day] is like a great spear [... ... The Grea]t Spirit too, which is in it, / is like a wise [crafts]man who might beautify and / set aright [all] the armou[r] for war. /

Once again, the Living Spirit is like a combatant / who might go towards a king's [so]n who has been taken prisone[r of war], and he redeems him [from the] hands of his enemies. /

[The Amba]ssador to[o] is like a great man / [...] because of the treasure / [...] hand of his priso[ners / ...] these light powers [... ... the] sons and their soul, so that they would [... / ... (the soul) might] be brought forth in the land [wherein it] was imprisoned. /

Again he turned, and he says to his discip/[les]: You yourselves must be purifiers and re[dee]/mers of your soul, which is established in every place, so that y[ou may be counted] to the [c]ompany of the fathers of light [... / ...] of the kingdom in the new aeon, in the place of joy.

/ [Concerning the T]welve [15] Judges [of] the Father. /

While the Father of Greatness is the transcendent and eternal Judge, twelve of the emanated gods act as judges as they take their roles during the course of the history. Mani instructs his followers similarly to walk in the path of righteousness.

[O]nce again] he s[peaks] to his disciples: Twelve jud[ges / ex]ist; the great mighty givers of judgement! They were sen[t and / came] from the [ex]alted greatness to this place. They were assigned to different wo[rk]s / according to the command that the Judge, who belongs to the great[ness], [20] [en]trusted to all these judges. Now he, [the gr]ea[t / Ju]dge, he who transcends all the judges, who exists and [/ is e]stablished in the aeons of greatness; [he] is the Father of [Greatness]. /

[The fir]st judge is the First Ma[n, he w]ho humiliated [the ruler / of Darkness in the] beginning. He judged him ac[cording to a ju]dgement of righteousn[25][ess]; for he had exalted himself [against a kingdom] that [was not] his own. /

[The se]cond judge is the Living Spirit, he who came and bore / up the Man. [He t]oo [made] a judgement on a[ll] the powers [of] /darkness; which had woun[ded] the garments of the First Man./

[The th]ird judge [is the] Mother of Life, the Great Spirit, [she who [30] beauti]fied and set up [the] heavenly part of [the un]iverse, [according to / her] pleasure; which [...] her. She j[udged] the rulers / [abov]e; she f[ettered] and set them firmly in the place / [that is fitting for them.

The fo]urth [judge] is the Great Bu/[ilder, he who built the] new aeon of joy. He [35] [judged, according to a judgement of righte]ousness, the [storeho]uses of the [enemy]; (80) that death may not well up from this time on. He has constructed a prison for the / enemy. Also, upo[n] the crown [of the] building he has constructed a / throne for the First Man and all the fathers of light; / they who engaged the struggle with the evil one and were victorious over him.

The [fif]th [j]udge is the great King of Honour, he who dwells / and is established in the seventh firmament. He is the jud/ge of all the firmaments who gives a true judgement, according to / [a] judgement of righteousness, upon all the powers and all the [king]doms / [of the] firmaments.

The sixth judge is [the Th]ird Ambassador, he who came and displayed / [his image]. He purified the light [...] which his own / [...] also of the enemy, he has [... /

The eighth judge is Jesus the [Spl/endour], the father of all the apostles; because after [the Am]bassador had displayed his image and the l[i]gh[t] was taken / [...] a mass of rulers rose up from abov[e] / and below. Then they sent Jesus the Splendour. He came [... / ...] he descended and made a judgement in the / [firmaments. He separated] the steadfast [from] the convicted.

The tenth judge is [the Jud]ge who dwells in the atmosphere, judging all mankind. He [ma]/kes a separation between they who are good and they who are evil, setting [apart] / the righteous from the sinners. /

The eleventh judge is the Light Mind, he w[ho shall] / come and appear in the world. And he [choos]es the holy c[hur]ch, and he unveils [...] / and separates light from [darkness, and sets the truth apart from] (81) lawlessness.

The twelfth judge is the great / counsel, which is the summons and the obedience, which is appointed in / the elements. It is the one that makes a separation between / the good and the evil ones. At the end also it can gather itself together [5] and sculpt its own self in the Last St/atue. And it separates [light] from [darkness]. /

These are the twelve great and mighty judges who / were sent. They came from the great Judge, he who transcends / all the judges. / Concerning the Eighteen great / Thrones of all the Fathers. /

There are nine thrones established for the great gods in the eternal realm. Another nine are appointed in this universe, the arena of conflict, and thus of loss and redemption. The last of these thrones is that upon which the apostle of a particular time sits; and Mani illustrates to his audience that he is now occupying it.

[On]ce again he speaks to his disciples: Eighteen [25] [great thrones for all the fathers] exist and are appointed, which are es/[ta]blished in eighteen places! While there are nine among them / [appointed in] the outer aeons, they ex[is]t / [i]n all the worlds of the damage. /

(82) The second throne is that of the [gl]orious Mother of Life. / She is the origin of all the emanations that have come / to this world.

The third throne is / constructed for the father, the First Man. He is the one who [5] humiliated the entire first enmity, which existed in the / worlds of darkness.

The fourth throne is / that of the Beloved of the Lights, the great honoured Beloved o/f the aeons of greatness.

The fifth throne / is that of the glorious Great Builder; the great architect [10] who built the new aeon for a newn[ess], for [a ...] / for [the] fathers of light; also for a place of binding [and] a pri/son for the enemy and his powers.

[The sixth thro]n[e] / is that of the Living Spirit, the [glorious] mighty one, he who bore / up the First Man out from the [land of darkness]; [15] who also set in order and constructed the world[s ...] / both for a cleansing of the light, [and] for a binding [of the] / powers of the enmity.

The seventh th[rone is] / that of the Third Ambassador, the king of the zone, also the / master of all advices.

/ Concerning the Summons, / in which Limb / of the Soul it descended to the First Man. /

This chapter discusses the relationship between the First Man, who was saved from the abyss by the Living Spirit; and his limbs or sons, the living soul that is scattered throughout the material universe. The summons is the call to salvation, and together with the answer or obedience it forms the counsel of life. This is the active will for redemption that drives the soul (see 178.1 – 5).

Mani shows that the First Man is the head upon which the soul depends for its life. Although hidden in this time and space, his presence is still with us in his image and love which is the virginal soul. The Man gathers in the soul, and builds it up, so that as his trunk it eschatologically ascends back to the land of light. This trunk is the Pillar of Glory which reunites with the First Man at its head. At the end of time it is the Last Statue.

Once again one of the teachers questioned the enlightener. He says to h[im]: 10 In which limb of [the liv]i[ng] sou[l] did [the] summons descend / [to] the Man, who exists in the [a]eon? 20 Concerning the Seven Works / of the Living Spirit. /

The Living Spirit is the principal god of the second emanation (creation), whose tasks connect the first (descent) and the third (redemption). Therefore, he saves the First Man, defeats the demons who have devoured the living soul, and constructs the universe with the use of their bodies in which there is now both light and darkness. The universe is then held in place by the five sons of the Living Spirit and a multitude of other divine powers.

It is the Living Spirit who first called out the summons to redemption that, joined with the obedience of the First Man, becomes the active will to salvation. Thus it is mixed with the five sons of the Man, the soul.

[O]nce] again the enlightener speaks: The Living Spirit has done seven / [wo]rks with his strength.

[The fi/rst]: He brought the First Man up from the contest, the way 25 a pearl is [brought] up from the sea. /

[The s]econd: He spread about the one who had rebelled, he crucified / [h]im in every body.

The third: He / [tr]ampled, piled up, and pierced the essences of death. /

[The f]ourth: He constructed the ships of light.

The fi30[ft]h: He evoked his five sons, and distributed them about. They / [took] possession of the zone, they bore up under all the uni/[vers]e's weight. Also, he evoked three living words. He set / [them] upon the th[re]e vessels, another one upon the giant. / [Again, he evoked the] summons, that it might be mixed with the five shining 35 men.

Now time begins, and the sun and moon revolve through the heavens; the different cosmic cogs start to move; and the various events occur that will lead to life on earth, and thus ultimately to the salvation of the soul.

Once again the enlightener speaks: The Am[bassador performed ten] [35] works by his advent.

The displaying of the image of the Ambassador to the rulers of darkness is a crucial moment in the history of salvation, and achieves a first purification of the light that is bound up in the rulers. This leads to the establishment of the heavenly bodies; to the beginnings of life on earth; and ultimately to the completion of the salvific process in the ascent of souls to the sun and the return to the kingdom.

The King of Honour is enthroned in the seventh firmament from where he is able to control and judge all the evil powers fettered in the heavens. The wheel is here presented as a divination device by which he can know the plans and tricks of these demons as they seek to escape; but also the location of the five shining men, that is the soul mixed throughout the material universe.

[Agai]n the [apostl]e speaks about the wheel that exists in front / [of the King of Honour who dwells in] the seventh firma[35][ment ...] the root of the rulers above and (88) below in a great and cruel fetter; as the entire will / of the great King of Honour is placed in [it]. / Also, their entire enmity, which is in the firmaments, is [...] / and ensnared in it. / Concerning the Three Zones. /

The three 'zones' are those of the five powers of darkness, both male and female; the five sons of the First Man; and the five sons of the Living Spirit. The universe is so constructed that the first must depend upon the second, and the second upon the third. Thus the material powers are placed in the most vulnerable position, being 'hung' from soul; and the sons of the Living Spirit are in the strongest, holding the universe in place. Of these the King of Honour in the seventh firmament has a key role.

[O]nce agai]n the enlightener speaks about the Living Spirit: W/hen he built and constructed the worlds, he suspended the zones [5] on their zones, and within another zone also. The first zo/[n]e is the five powers of darkness, males and females. / This is why he hung one zone on a zone! He hung the five / powers of darkness on the five shining men, the sons of the M/[a]n; because all the enmity is entwined and bound in them. / Concerning the Light Mind and [20] the Apostles and the Saints. /

This long and complex chapter demonstrates the correlation between the macrocosmos and the microcosmos of the human body. The prodigious gods and demonic beings who inhabit Mani's worlds are here integrated with the more accessible workings of religious psychology. These insights into the life of the community aid an understanding of the appeal and success of Manichaeism.

89.21 – 90.14 A disciple asks Mani a series of questions about the Light Mind, the god who enters into the believer and transforms the old man into the new man. How can this happen, and why does the old man continue to rebel? He also asks Mani about his apostolate.

90.15 – 92.8 Mani begins his discussion with the macrocosmos. The universe is constructed in the form of a human. Its life and soul are the five sons of the First Man. The five sons of the Living Spirit are the intellectual qualities, who act as sleepless guardians, each firmly established in its place. The summons and the obedience, that is the active will to salvation personified in Jesus the Youth, become the sixth sons of each. The Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man, is the Mind in the universe.

92.9 – 94.16 The five sons of the Living Spirit each have their appointed watch-districts. Yet, demonic rebellions have occured in each during the course of cosmic history; and have had to be dealt with by various gods.

94.17 – 95.1 Similarly the Light Mind dwells in the human body, and needs to deal with the treachery of sin manifested by the old man who still lies bound within. Mani assures his listeners that despite the recurrence of evil the powers of light know the final victory; and thus always act for the good.

95.2 – 10 Mani briefly answers the disciple's question as to how the mighty Light Mind can live in this small fleshly body.

95.10 – 97.24 Sin constructed the human body from evil matter. Yet, its soul is divine, being taken from the five sons of the First Man. The five intellectual qualities were bound in the body and overlaid by corresponding evil qualities. This led the soul into error and forgetfulness of its true origin. When the Light Mind comes it frees the divine qualities, binds the evil ones, and imprisons sin. Thus the believer is transformed into a new man.

97.24 – 99.17 Nevertheless, sin can rebel and cloud the intellectual qualities, leading the believer once again into error. Mani explains the process by which such a person may gradually come to turn against the true faith, despite the love and support of church leaders and friends.

99.18 – 100.17 Mani emphasises to his disciple that he has now explained the workings of the Light Mind in the body, whose role corresponds to that of the watch-keepers in the macrocosmos. By purifying the spiritual intellect the elect can ascend in their hearts to God the Father, and know everything.

100.19 – 102.3 Mani now turns to the disciple's final question about his apostolate; and explains how he, although a solitary man against the world, has been victorious over all the kings and earthly powers. Thus he has achieved more than all previous apostles, excepting only Jesus.

102.4 – 12 The disciples thank Mani and promise to be strong in their faith.

[O]nce again, at one of the times, a disciple questioned the [apostle] / saying to him: You have told us that the / Light Mi[nd] is this one who shall come and assume the saints. [You sai/d] it to us like this: He too is one among the gods [... [25] ...] many gods are with him. You have also told / us: [W]hen he enters withi[n the body / of] the flesh and binds the ol[d ma]n with his five counsels, he / [set]s his five [couns]els upon him in the five limbs / [of his] body.

[So], no[w], where is he? In that the old man is chained in the bo[30]dy! For I see how rebellions arise there despite / his bondage, from ti[me] to time.

Also, secondly, I a/[s]k you: If then he is a great God, unchanging and im/measurable, how could he come and appear in the smallness of the bo/[dy]?

The third thing I want you to recount to [35][me ...] a holy one is the Mind, and he is pure; / [...] the defilement of this body?

(90) Fourthly: If truly the Light Mind exists in [the s]/aints, why is his likeness not displayed to us, the way th/at he is?

The fifth thing I want, for / you to tell me and explain about your apostola[te]. [5] Look, it is not clear to me! For they oppress / and persecute you in the world. /

I entreat you: Can you persuade me about these things that I have asked you? /

T[hen] he speaks to that disciple: My en[tire] revelati[on], / which I have unveiled, I have declared to my chu[r][10]c[h]. In your presence! This one alone among [... / ...] him.

This disciple says [to the apost]/l[e]: All that you have unveiled you have [...] / in our presence. Yet, I wanted to kno[w ... the] / L[igh]t Mind, the way that he is.

[15] Then the apostle says to him: If I shall repeat [... / ...] to you about these things that you are so set upon, and they become true [f]/o[r] you after you are so set upon them, will you understand what you [... / ...]? On your account I will give vision to they who see! I will / make the living fountain overflow for the thirsty, that they may drink and [l]iv[e].

[20] Then speaks the apostle to him: All the error, when the / en[e]my of the lights constructed it, he constructed after the likeness of / a man. *42 Probably an error for the seventh firmament.

They kill the / apostles and the righteous in the watch-district of the Adam[ant] / of Light, time after time, and from generation to generation. /

Once again: In the watch of the great King of Glory, wh[o] is the great counsel, he who exercises authority over the thre[e] / wheels. A [dis]turbance came about, and an affliction, for [they were ...] / pained and oppressed in the three earths. [O]nce again: In the watch of the Porter, he who humiliates [... / upr]ising of the abysses below [... / ...] bent, the fastenings underneath were loosened [...] / in the foundation below.

[On] account of the earthquake that happened in the watch of the Keeper of Splen/[dour], the Pillar of Glory came forth; as it [... / ...] helper of the Keeper of Splendour. It bore up under all [burden]s. /

Conversely, because of the treachery and the uprising that / happened in the watch of the great King of Honour, which is the wat[25]chers who came down to earth from the heavens; / four angels were called upon about them. They bound the watche/[r]s with an eternal chain, in the prison of the blackened ones (?). / [Th]ey obliterated their children from upon the earth. /

[Th]en, again, the abortions descended in the watch of the Adamant [and] begat Adam and Eve; because of that great treachery wh/[ich] happened, and the mystery of wickedness, he sent Jesus / [...] the prayer of the five sons. He assumed them / [...] the abortions. He fastened them beneath the / [... the] mind of Adam.

(94) Also, because of the earthquake that happened in these three / earths, and in that the paths were hindered and the springs of / wind and water and fire were impeded, Jesus cast himself down. He / assumed Eve; and he straightened the tracks of the [win]d, the water, and the fire. He opened the springs for them, and he set [in ord]er the path / of their ascent.

Once [again]: Since the / earth beneath the Porter was loose[ned from] the fastenings that / [...] because of this too Jesus went down, assuming / [Ev]e until he reached tha[t] place. [H]e set in [or]der and stre[10]ngth[ened] the fastenings beneath. He returned, [he came] up to his / [...] rest.

Then speaks the a[po]stl[e] to him: / Look at all these watches of the zon[e], the ones in which these / great gods are master, w[atch]ing over them [...] / Uprisings have happened, and treachery, in them. The [... [15] ...] in them from time to time; with a great hum[iliati]on, / until they humbled the powers of the enmity. /

So also is this body! A mighty power lives / here, even if it is small in its stature. Nevertheless, s/in dwells within, and the old man who is lodged in it. Certainly he is cruel, [20] with great cunning; until the Lig/ht Mind finds how to humble this body, and drive it [according to] / his pleasure.

Just so, in the w[atch-]districts / of his great outer brothers, they who are masters in the zone. / In them, in the great body: the earthquake and treachery happened [25] from time to time. So, also, is the watch-district of the / Mind, which is the body of the flesh. Sin raises [up], / from time to time, its agitations in the body. /

Now you (pl.), understand thus, that the powers of light / are good. The beginning and the end are unveiled to them. [30] All that they do is being done with correct judgement. / Indeed, because of this they may permit the enmity / to initiate error, and do its pleasure [for] / a moment. Then they seize [... (95) ...] they have acted first with a righteous judgement. /

And [with resp]ect to this other (question) that you have put forward: How may the Light / Mind come, this great and honoured mighty one, and assume this little / body of the flesh? Again, look, see! These gods, in that [5] [... are] great and mighty ones. And each one of them is enclosed and hard pr/[essed] i[n this pl]ace wherein he is set; like trees / [hol]ding to their taproot. So also this is how each / [o]ne of them has 'held to his taproot' in the world, according to / [the] k[ind] of place in which he is set, bearing up till [10] [...]

Now, also, happen you know / [...] the world is set firm, being ordered [... / the five sons of the] Living Spirit in all its members / [...] sin took this body out from [the] la/[nd (?) ... co]nstructed it in its members. It took its [bod]y [15] [from the five b]odies of darkness. (Sin) constructed the body. Yet, its / [sou]l i[t] took from the five shining gods. / [(Sin) bou]nd (the soul) in the five members of the body. It bound the mind / in bone; the thought in sinew; the insight in vein; the cou/nsel in flesh; the consideration in ski[n].

(Sin) set f[20][ast] its five powers: its mind upon the mind of the soul; / [its] thought upon the thought of the soul; its insight upon the insight / [of] the [s]oul; its counsel upon the counsel of the soul; its consider/[atio]n upon the consideration of the soul. It placed its five / [an]gels and authorities upon the five members [25] [of the] soul, which it had brought in and bound in the flesh. They / [...], pronouncing to the soul and continually leading it on to / every evil thi[n]g, to all the sins of lust, to the / [wor]ship of idols, to erroneous opinions, to humili/[ation]; in the humiliation of slavery! As it is set fast, wors[30][hipping] the things that [...] will not remain; making obeisance / [...] idols of wood and gold and silver. / [...] worshipping beasts (96) that are unclean and polluted! They are ugly in their appearances and their / forms.

(The soul) assumed error and forgetfulness. It for/got its essence and its race and its kindred; kn[o]/wing not the door of the place to pray to him, nor call up [5] to him. It became hostile to its father [... / ...] itself, being wicked [... / ...] its own light [...

The] Light / [Mind] comes and finds the soul [... / ...] it assuming it in the [... [10] ...] its wisdom [... / ...] he shall become for it [... / ...] the bonds [...] / members in the body. He shall loosen the m[ind of the soul and relea/se] it from the bone. He shall release the th[ought of the soul] [15] from the sinew; and s[o] bind the thought [of the sin in] the sinew. He shall release the insight of the soul from the vei[n]; / and so bind the insight of the sin in the vein. [He sh]all / loosen the counsel of the soul, and release it from the flesh; / and so bind the counsel of the sin in the flesh. He shall [20] release the consideration of the soul from the skin; and bin[d] / the consideration of the sin in the skin. /

This is how he shall release the members of the soul, / and make them free from the five members of sin. / Conversely, these five members of sin, which were loose; [25] he shall bind them. He shall set right the members of the soul; form / and purify them, and construct a new man of them, a child [o]/f righteousness. [And] when [he] fashions and const[r]/ucts and purifies the new man; then he shall bring forth five / great living members out from the five great memb[ers]. There are occasions when sin shall mount / [u]p with its foolishness; and it disturbs the consideration, and it clouds / the wisdom and the understanding of the person. Yet, if he shall not make this watch secure, (sin) shall rise up / and assume his mind; and disturb his mind, which formerly was calm. / It shall disrupt his love, away from his teacher and his 5 instructor. It shall take from his heart love of the churc/h, and fill it full of hatred. And all his brethren become hateful / before him. H[i]s brethren and his loved ones and his friends / who love him; they shall be like enemies before him. / Now, that person is disturbed like this, and he lets his [10] love and his will turn from him. That person shall / [himse]lf become a vessel of loss, and he separates fr[om] / the church, and his end comes down to the world. / The Mind, who was in him, sh[a]ll disperse from him and go / to the apos[t]le who sent him. He shall be filled by evil spirits; [15] and they deal with [him], dragging [hi]m hither and thither. And he himself becomes like / wordl[y] me[n]. [He] will change and become as if a b/[i]rd, were its feathers plucked out. He becomes an earthly man. /

[T]hen, have I taught you, and opened your (sg.) [eyes], as to how / confusion shall arise in the zo[ne]; in the camps of [20] these great mig[hty] gods? Again, this is how / disturbance shall come about, from ti[me] to time, in the [...] of the / [Li]ght [M]ind. So al[so] these watch-keepers, for they are set [... / f]i[rm in] the zone, (but) they are not visible. Again, this too is the way / of the Light Mind, [for he is] not visible in the body.

[25] Also, [corr]esponding to th[ese] outer [watch-keepers]; in that while they are great, / [y]et have they contorted themselves. They have [...], they have become small, to the measure of the task / [th]at is apportioned to each o[n]e [of t]hem. Again, this too is like / [the] Mind, himse[lf] a great one, and exalted; but he is bent over / and [has] become small, to this little worthless [bo]dy.

[30] [Even so] the gods [in the] outer [z]one: they are transcendent / and purified, they are set [f]a[st in] the mingling of the totality, (but) are not defiled. / [This too is like the] Light [Mind]. While he is placed in hi[s / ...]

(100) Again, behold the mightiness and the activity of the Light / Mind: how vast he is over all the watch-districts of / the body! He stays fast at his camp. He shuts off / all deliberations of the body from the beguilements of sin. [5] He limits them and distributes them out. He sets them down / at his pleasure.

Also, he does another work, surpassing and ex/ceeding (these). He bestows a great spirit upon the ele/ct one. Indeed, now may you find him, as he stands on the earth, / [r]ising up in his heart and ascending to the Father, the [10] G[o]d of truth. He who exists and is established above / all the things of loss. [Onc]e again, he may push dow/n [i]n his insight and his consideration, and descend to / the land of darkness, from where the darkness has poured forth. / His heart shall run and touch everything, as it [...]

[15] Then he says to [th]at discip[le: I have taught you] / the deeds of the [Light] Mind! Whoever has / an open and percept[ive] eye, [he can] appear to him. Whoever / has not that eye, he can not appear to him. /

And, also, as to my work that [is] not [manife]st nor revealed to you, [20] the deeds that I have done; I will teach you about t/hem, and open your eyes [to] this wonder [...] / and of my leadership. /

Observe from this! That I, a single Manichaios, I have come to the wo/rld alone. And the races [and] kindreds of the body, [25] and the gold and silver and [br]ass [...] copper, and the / many gifts and breast[plates and] armour of [the] / multitude, and [m]uch humani[ty], submit to me. / Many types of gods and idols from / smelting furnaces! You (pl.) have beheld the k[ingdom] of the world. For, despite great effort, [ev][30]en with many benefits and [gif]ts, with a / breastplate and a violent war; they have not subdued [the ci]/ties nor conquered the countries. [Yet, I, I have conquered] / without breastplate and without [armour] (101) distant [cities] by the word of God, and distant countries. / And they bless my name, and it is glorified in all countries. /

[Und]erstand also another thing that I will teach you. The k/in[g]s have striven with me, and the nobles and [offi][5]cials and their powers, so that they might bring to nothing this truth. T/hey did not have the strength for this against me. Now, if I am alone, / why did they not have power against me? Namely, all these who have [striv]/en with me.

The third thing: [No on]/e in the world has given freedom to his children [a]nd [10] his brothers and his kin, and made them fr[ee] f/rom the variance of all things, the way I have. [I who have made] / all my children free from every toil and every [... / ...]

wis]dom; so that you will not find a single one among man[15]-[kind ...] and he is victorious over them. For as no single per/son is able to be victorious over me in the entire world; so it [i]s also like this for my children. No person will be able to be victorious over them! /

[The fi]fth thing: I have chosen with my power this entire great elect/ion. I have given my children my emblems of authority [... [20] a]nd the great springs of wisdom, so that [...] / apostle [...] of the church [... / ...] I have made it mine. I have made my church strong, and appointed in it / all [goo]d things that are beneficial to it in every matter. / [I have pl]anted the good, I have sown the truth in every land, f[25]ar and near. Apostles and ambassa/[d]ors I have sent to all countries. Therefore, the former apo/[st]les who came before them did not do as I have do[ne / in] this hard generation; apart from Jesus only, the son of / greatness, who is the father of all the apostles. [30] [S]o, all of the apostles have not done as [I, / I have] done! Look again, and see now: How great is my / [power] and my activity? For not one among the former apo/[stles, ... i]n the flesh has reached my like in the / [...] through me. For this great (102) door has been opened, opened by me, to the gods and the angels and / mankind, and all the spirits and the living souls, who are prep/ared for life and eternal rest. /

Then, after his disciples had heard all these sayings, which he [5] proclaimed, his disciples answered. They say to him: Gre[at] / and mighty are all these things that you have uttered to us; which / [you] have [do]ne by your power, and the power of the one who sent you. Who / could fully recompense you for the grace that you have d/one [u]s, except this one who sent you? Still, the on[l]y gift [10] available to us, to repay you, is this: that we will make ourselves strong in / y[our] faith; and persevere in your commandments; and / also be per[s]uaded of your word, which you have proclaimed to us.

/ Concerning the Three Da[15]ys and the Two Deaths. /

Patterns of temporal and sequential classification were of great importance to Mani, who used them to structure his system, to teach, and to evangelise. Compare chapters 4 and 17. The particular focus and interest in this kephalaion is the eschatological detail. Life in this time and world is but a precursor to the reign of the saints in the new age and the new earth. There the First Man, the victorious son, will be king (H. 41.11-20). However, this too comes to an end; when the hidden Father at lasts reveals his image, and receives the souls and gods back into the heart of the eternal kingdom, from where they have been barred since the beginning of the conflict. In contrast to this glorious hope, sinners are warned of a second death, eternally separated from life and the divine.

Once again the apostle speaks to his disciples: Hap/pen you know, my beloved ones, that there exist three great / mighty days in all; and also two great / and bitter deaths.

When his disciples hea[20]rd they say to him: Tell us our father, what are th[ese] / three great days? Or again, what are these two de[aths] / that are bitter?

He speaks to them. / The first day is our father, the Man. From the ti[me] / when the First Man went down to the abyss of darkness [25] and drowned in it; and the Living Spirit was sent, who w[ent] / and bore him up. After the Man had ascended, the Father o/f Life and the Great Spirit set things in order, and the wo/rlds above and below.

Furthermore, the glorious [Am]/bassador came and dwelt in the ship of the day. [30] He displayed his glorious image, and he purified [the li]/ght out of all things. He walked in the heights of the [hea]/vens. Till the time when the world will be dissolved, / all things destroyed, the great [fire] released, / and the Last Statue ascends. [35] These three deeds were be[gun] on this first [day, when they sent] / the First Man with his five [sons].

In contrast, [the first death] (103) is the darkness that mixed with the five sons / of the First Man.

The second day / is the time when the fathers of light, who were victorious in the struggle, / will sit on their thrones in the new aeon and dw[5]ell on the new earth. And they reign in the new [aeon] / till the Father unveils his image / above them.

The {length of the sojourn}*[43] in the [ne]w aeon / equals the measure of the first day spent [in affli]/ction. They will reign like this and rejoice in [the n]ew [aeon].

[10] The great third day [is the time] / when the Father will unveil over them his [image ... / ...] and he raises them up [...] / and he receives them in to his hidden treasur[y ...] / and he gives [...] his soul. He can pour out upon th[em ...] [15] his ambrosia and his sweet perfume, which ta[kes away] / all affliction that they have seen with their eyes. [...] / fullness and a joy eternal! When his / [g]race would sate them, he gives to them his [...] a/[nd t]hey are made anew in them. Also, he can summon them once more [in] peace [20] and silence, and perfect their stature in sa[m]e measure / as his first aeons. And he sets each power / [i]n its aeon, in its dwelling-place. They will dwell in the [n]ew aeon / in their aeons! Now, when they dwell in / their aeons, they will become rich beyond measure, [25] for ever, beyond time.

From then on they will not count / that season amongst them; nor the number / [o]f the days, nor the hours, generation after generation, for / [e]ver and ever. The Father will not be hidden from them, from / [this] tim[e] on. Rather, he has accomplished (his) unveiling to them [...] he being revealed [30] [to them] forever.

These are the three great days, / [which the Fath]er o[f Gre]atness has given number to in the reck/[oning].

In contrast, the two deaths that I have pro/[claimed to you a]re [these].

(104) The first death is from the time when the light fell to / the darkness, and was mixed in with [the] rulers of darkness; un/til the time when the light will become pure, and be separated from the dark/ness in that great fire. The remainder left be[5]hind there can build and add to that Last / Statue.

Now, the second death is the death in which / the s[ou]ls of sinful men shall die; when / [they will] be stripped of the shining light that illuminates / the world. And also they are separated from the living air, from which they receive [10] [livin]g bre[ath]; and they are deprived of this living soul, which / [...] in the world; and they are separated and swept / away from this Last Statue [... / ...] and bound on [... / ...] the female will become [...] [15] their torture and their affliction; for their deeds [...] / those three places; because they have blasphemed and despised the / Holy Spirit since [ev]ery generation of the world.

These are the / two deaths. The first death is temporal; [but] the sec/ond death is eternal. It is the sec[20]o[nd deat]h!

/ Concerning the Three Things that / were established by the Light. /

This chapter continues the eschatological theme of the previous. Since the enemy had attacked the light in the beginning, three results became inevitable that would alter the relationship between the two principles in their future eternal separation: the new earth is built over this universe; it will imprison the darkness as in a coffin (?); and the souls of sinners will be condemned and crucified on the enemy.

This doctrine of the final lump, the literal mass of the damned, was an essential part of Mani's system. The tragic loss of some of the light soul, too deeply enmeshed in darkness and sin to be saved, was accepted as an inevitable consequence of the power of evil. In order to ensure that the darkness could never again multiply and rebel against the light, its powers (especially the males and females) are separated so as to sterilise it, and to prevent it planning an attack.

Once again he speaks to his disciples, these who are not associates in the my[stery*44] [25] of his knowledge: Three things would be fashioned / by the light through necessity! For there can be no other way / nor other result, to allow them to stay without coming about. For / the darkness, the enemy, mu[st] be bound by them; he who stood up again[st] / the light from the beginning. Due to this, these things have no (other) res[ult], [30] to allow them to stay without coming about. /

Now, the first thing is the new luminous earth, w[h]/ich was set and built on top of this earth [...] / it, namely that alien body [...] built upo[n it]. /

The second thing is this: They will [...] and they [...] [35] the new earth, the coffin [...] (105) of the dark fire, the companion of the enemy.

The thi/rd thing is the souls of all the sinners who have been con/demned by their deeds. They were [...] over them woe; they have been / condemned according to the wicked deeds they had committed, and due to this they will be crucif[5]ied on the enemy, he who had raised himself up against the greatness.

They will / seal up*[45] this final lump when / all the likenesses and images of every shape will be nailed in it. Also, those will be bo[und] / by this last fetter for eternity, and be [plac]ed / as a footstool and a mat*[46] and a rag for this coffin [...] [10] which is the prison of the enemy. It will be placed, being a [bound]ary-/marker and a great void between the two, between the [darkne]ss / and the enemy, so that they can not reach one another, nor can they [h]ea/r their voices; rather they will become sterile as they are separated from each other / for [eve]r and [e]ver.

/ Concerning the Three Blows that / befell the Enemy because of the Light. /

The eschatological focus continues with further details on the final binding of the darkness, and the separation of male and female respectively in a lump (βῶλος) and a tomb (τάφος). Mani uses the description of the fate of sinners to exhort the faithful to remain firm despite persecution.

The sequence of content in chapters 39 – 41 provides a good example of how Mani's lessons have undergone some rudimentary redaction in the construction of the Kephalaia.

[O]nce again he t[u]rned, and says: The darkness itself, the enemy, / has received three bad blows with three wars; and 20 worse dangers from the light in those three wars. /

The first: (The enemy) was brought out to the middle and separated / from his dark earth, whence he had departed. He was vanquished / in that first war, caught and / [bo]und by the living soul.

The second blow 25 is the time when he will be dissolved and melted, and he perishes in / this great fire. He is destroyed and overthrown, from the images / that are all by which he exists. And he will be gathered in / [to the] fetter corresponding to his archetype, and be made like he w/[a]s from the first beginning.

30 [The t]hird blow that will befall the enemy is the 'rolling back' / [at the] end when everything will be separated, and male will be divided / [from] female. Now, the male will be bound in the lump, [b]ut the fem/[ale] w[ill be thrown] i[n] to the tomb. For it will be divided / [... by a great] stone in their midst, for generat35[ion upon generation, for ever and] ever.

(106) This is the way that the binding of the enemy will come about, in a fet/ter that is burdensome and strong, one from which there is never escape; / because [they have achieved] his binding and bound him for ever. / And they have achieved his being set apart, and he has been set apart for ever.

[5] Due to this I say to my beloved ones: Hear my words / that I proclaim to you! Gird yourselves for the things o/[f li]fe. Endure the persecutions and trials th/at wi[ll come] to you. Be you strong in these commandments that I have give/n [y]ou, so that you may escape those two deaths [10] and be free from this final bond [i]n which there is no hope of / lif[e]. And you will escape the terrible end of the de/niers and blasphemers who have seen truth with their own eyes, and have turne/d back from it. They will go to the place of punishm[en]t [where]in / there is no day of life. For the enlightening light will be hidden fr[om t]he[m], [15] and they will be unable to see it from this moment. / Air and wind will be drawn from them, and they will not receive life breath / in them from this moment. Waters and moisture will be taken from them, / and they will not taste them again. /

Blessed is every one who will escape the end of sin[20]ners and deniers, and be free from the ruin that lies hidden for ever!

/ Concerning the Three / Vessels. /

This kephalaion begins a sequence of three complex chapters wherein Mani seeks to justify the actions of the Living Spirit in his construction of the universe; and in particular his management of the three vessels of dark elements (water, darkness and fire) by means of the three vessels or garments of light elements (wind, water and fire). Essentially, the Living Spirit discharges down to earth the dark elements from the rulers who are bound in the heavens; and then 'sweeps' them out to the edge of the universe into pits that have been prepared for them. The light elements ascend up through the universe to purity and rest. Since this process must result in some contamination on earth, Mani is at pains to explain that it has been done in the best possible manner.

106.32 – 107.26 The Living Spirit is like a good doctor who discharges sickness and poison (the dark elements) by means of healing drugs (the light elements).

107.26 – 108.16 The light elements cause the dark to be discharged as a child is from its mother.

108.16 – 36 The processes by which the dark elements are poured upon the earth and then swept out to the edge of the universe are carefully managed, so that each occurs at the appropriate time.

109.1 – 111.17 These actions have brought twelve advantages. In the first of these Mani explains that the timing by which each evil vessel is discharged is such as to keep the contamination to a minimum. The other advantages relate to details about the purification of the heavenly realms, and the containment of evil.

Once again the disciples questioned the enlightener, saying t[o h]i[m]: [25] Tell us, our master, and instruct us about these / three vessels that [...] and were discharged fr[om] / above, and how they were discharged and separated from / all [the] rulers who are arranged in the [heaven]s. For it is a ne[ce]/ssity for us to know [the manne]r in which [30] the three vessels have been discharged, while the rulers were [flour]/ishing in their body. /

Then the enlightener speaks to his disciples: [Hap]pen you [kn]/ow, my beloved ones, that when these v[es]/sels [were dis]ch[arged], they were discharged in [...] [35] slaughter, but those [...] these vessels from them.

They are like the for[m] / of a man who has fallen into a purulent sickness. Other wounds / and diseases are in his body, and even bile and other po[i]/sons are in his inner limbs. [H]e achieves good [5] health by a wise doctor, who gives him one remedy to drink that causes hi[s] / purulent sickness to break out above, and gives him another medicine to drink / that causes his sickness to discharge below, [and he gives him] / yet another medicine [to drink] that cures his wounds for him [...] / calmly and silently. Through the skill of a [10] wis[e] d[oc]tor, with his effective medicines to consume that t[ake awa]y / all sicknesses [in t]his manner and dissolve all magic, the d[oc]tors shall / [...] they work cures through the aroma of the medicine, other wounds / [...] what is hidden, they at last tear them out from / [...] manifested above and below [15] [... throug]h the aroma of edible medicines that were placed upon them. /

This is also [w]hat these vessels / of water, of darkness an[d o]f fire are like, which are hidden in the body / of all the rulers above; while the Living Spirit is li/ke the wise doctor. These three healing d[20]rugs are the three garments that the Living Spirit assumes / upon his body: of wind, of water, and of fire. / Through them he has set in order the things below. For by those th/ree garments he has been displayed to the rulers who are / [ab]ove, with hard-heartedness, with shaking and fear, with [25] derangement; from them he discharged the three ve/ssels, those of water, of darkness and of fire.

The case / of these vessels is just [lik]e a / [ch]ild who is in his mother's [wo]mb and is swathed by sev/[e]n garments. The first [is] the marrow, the second is the bones, [30] [the] third is the [tendons], the fourth is the flesh, the fi/[fth] the veins, the [sixt]h the blood, the seventh / [the sk]i[n of] the bo[dy th]at covers him. The other garment also [... / ... in the wo]mb of his mother. His mother also / [is] ju[st] like] this child. The marrow [35] [and the bones, the sinews and fl]esh, the veins and blood and skin, together with the garment that she wears and the linen that swa/thes her, total nine. Together wi[th] the nine of the child, these and the / others, they shall complete and make eighteen garments. Now, you shall find the / soul of this child is entwined within all these. [5] And look see: When the smell of / the action of the demon, which brings about the stench of birth, wi[ll rev]eal the child; immediately [...] shall / [...] all [these things] and it emerges from a crack that has becom/e visible, while no tear nor wound occurs in the body of [10] the [chi]ld. In the same way as this child [opens up] / the w[om]b of his mother, so is it also with / these vessels of water, of dar[kness] and [of] / fire. The actions that open up his [mother][47] / to the child, and she shakes him out and reveals [him; these] [15] are the three living garments that the [Living] Spirit [assumed on / his][48] body.

For by the aspect of the garment of water [... / ...] from the rulers; he moved / [...] they are the poison and / [d]eath with which their veins and entrails are filled.

[20] By the aspect of the garment of wind, in [which] he was revealed / [...] he has swept away and erased the entire destructive shadow / and dirt, discharged it down to the earth. Afterwards / he swept it out and confined it in the vessel of darkness that / surrounds the universe.

Also, by the garment of living fire, [25] through its splendour and

He swept [it] / another time from the earth and confined it in the vessel that surrou/nds all the worlds, and they call [i]t the wall of grea[t] / fire. Now, those three garm[ents], through which he [estab][30]lished these three things, he did not peel t/hem off all at once; but h[e strip]ped them off one by one / at the appropriate time [...] down [to the] e/arth [...] /

(109) Furthermore, he continued. He says to his disciples: The us/e of the matter, and the management of these vessels that were swept o/ut and discharged from above to [eart]h, have brought an advantage and benefit of / twelve great deeds. Afterwards, they were swept from the ear[th] [5] and pushed outside to the edges of the worlds and to the {extremity}*[49] / of the zone.

/ Concerning the Vessels.

Following the previous chapter this kephalaion provides further details about the vessels, and the creative activity of the Living Spirit in the construction of the universe. The demiurge is termed the Father of Life, an epithet that may provide evidence of a particular stage in the development of Mani's thought. The term is often used in the Kephalaia when this god is paired with the Mother of Life; see chapter 9.

111.26 – 112.18 The Living Spirit poured out the vessels of water, darkness and fire (dark elements) upon this earth; and then scooped them up by means of his three garments of wind, water and fire (light elements). The dark were finally poured into three pits that he had constructed. However, a remnant of each remains upon earth, dark qualities that mar the light.

112.24 – 113.19 The Living Spirit had a particular reason for this process, even though it has some negative results. The dark elements that he poured down from above drew towards them those on the earths below; and thus all this waste could be swept out together into the pits that had been prepared.

113.19 – 25 Now that the levels of the universe have been purified, the light elements are able to ascend through them.

[O n]ce again the disciples questioned him, saying to him: Wh[en] / the Father of Life discharged these three vessels from / above, they of water and of darkness and of fire, did he perhaps / discharge them to their pits at the edge of the firmament? Or did h/e discharge them first to this earth, and then he swept them from the earth [a]nd threw them to their p[lace]s? /

[Th]en the apostle says to them: As for what you have asked me a/[bo]ut the vessel[s], you must understand this, that when the Father / [of] Life was about to di[sc]harge these three vessels he / [p]oured the three upon this earth, one by one at its (appointed) hour and season. He discharged them and cast them down to the earth. /

[Th]en he bailed and scooped them from this earth in these thr/[ee] garments, they of wind and of water and of fire, which swathed / his body. He poured and made them flow into the three pits / [... w]hich he had [es]tablished during the construc[tio]n of the worlds [...] they [...] something remained (112) behind on the face of the earth from these three [v]ess[e]/ls, so that you can find their mark and type display/ed in the universe.

The e[le]m[e]nt that is left in water is / the pungency and the salinity of this salty inner sea that surrounds the worlds.

And the remnant that is left from the darkness / is this black mountain that exists in the s[urroundings] of the sunrise. / For when the sun would shine over the world no / sunlight is visible there, because the darkness that gushes / fr[om i]t manifests above it.

And [the re]mnant [10] that remains behind from the fire, upon the earth, are all the mountains / and islands from where fumes*[53] of fire gush up / [an]d are visible. For these things are the remnant of the great ve/ssel, the vestige that was conjoined with this fire that comes up / from the earth; together with the mountains and hills [...] [15] place[s] where no fruit sprouts on the tr[e]es [...] / greater than that place from the limb and [... / ...] the trees shall not bear / fruit in that place. /

Once again his disciples speak to him: We ask you, our master, [20] to [make clear] and instruct us about the vessels that / surround the universe, and why they were not discharged from above into the / ditches prepared for them (straightaway); but were firstly poured / upon the earth, and afterwards were swept from the earth and cast dow/n into their pits?

Then the enlightener speaks to his discip[25]les: Happen you know this! When the Father o/f Life discharged these vessels from above upon the earth, he poured them out / for this reason: so that also the water and the darkness and the fire that / exist in these three earths would be drawn a[nd] ascend towards they / that had come down from above, and the earths [would be] purified and c[l][30]eansed. Due to this he poured these vessels down to the eart[h], / of water and of darkness and of fire, so that also / the water and darkness and fire that exist in the earths would be drawn up [tow]/ards they that had descended from above.

Now, first o[f] / all, [h]e discharged the water, the waste, [the p]oison of the rule[rs] [35] who are above. He c[leans]ed the firmaments of the [water ...] / he poured do[wn] the [da]rk waters. [Just as the] (113) waters fell from heaven to earth, so also the wat/ers below in the earths were drawn and came u/p from below towards the waters that had come from above to the earths. / The waters [were] purified of the dark poison that exists in them. [5] Then he swept them outside and made them a great ve/ssel and a wall of sea that surrounds the universe, / and on w[hi]ch the ships sail.

After the water, he / discharged the darkness. He purified the firmaments and dried from t/hem the darkness with which they are weighed down. He discharged it down to the earth. [10] Just as he had purified the firmaments, so also he puri[f]ied th/e earths. The darkness that is in the earths was drawn up towards the darkness [t]hat had been / [discharged] from above. He swept them both out and s[hut them] i/[n] that [...] of darkness [... / ...] the water.

And he discharged the fire from heaven to earth, [15] [... at] that time again the fire that was shut / [in] the earth below was drawn and came up towards its kind. / Fire was added to fire. Afterwards, he swept it out and cast it / into the outer underworld, which [he had constructed fo]r them outside the uni/verse.

In the same way that he purified the firmaments above as a place [20] for the light-givers to journey [... / ...] so also he purified the earths below and sw/ept from them the fire and the darkness and the water [...] / He has purified them for the ascent of these three powers, they of the wind and the water / and the fire, which ascend before the Porter and [25] traverse the earths.

/ Concerning the Sea / Giant. /

113.29 – 114.3 The Living Spirit causes his son the King of Glory to turn the three wheels of wind, water and fire. Thus these good elements are set free. However, the waste of the evil elements (water, darkness and fire) that have been poured onto the earth from the three vessels; this he deposits in the sea. Therefore, its water is salty and bitter.

114.3 – 115.4 Also in the sea is the monstrous giant that takes form from the fire and lust, the active evil 'thought', in the waste matter that the Living Spirit has swept down from the sphere (also 136.23 – 26). Consequently, the sea giant has sealed upon him the aspects of the stars and the signs of the zodiac.

115.5 – 31 The divine plan has three purposes: to purify the sphere of the evil elements; to use the sea giant as a fetter to prevent the evil astral powers ascending or descending; to gather in the sea all the good and evil elements that are washed into it. All the good life that comes into the sea will be purified.

[O]n]ce again the e[nlightene]r speaks to his disciples: After the [30] Livin[g S]pirit constructed things and the worlds, he came up and / [s]et himself upon this earth. He gave a sign to the King of Glory, who / [t]urned the three wheels and caused the wheels that are found [...] / up above all the mountains; he spread forth the wind to / [the]m, he breathed on them, he stirred them up, he washed the earth with the water[35]s. And the waste and the accretion of the three vessels, they of / [water and of] darkness [and] of fire, which had been discharged upon (the earth), he gathered them / [and deposited them in the]*[54] sea that is within the walls (114) and the vessels; because of this sea waters are salty. / For they have received salt and bitterness from the washing out and cle/ansing of the three vessels.

When the Father / of Life came, rising in his ascent to the heights, he dischar[5]ged the wheel of the stars; he washed it out and loosened / all the [sedi]ment that was in it. He cast it down to this great / inner sea like [...] of the mountain. And t[ha]t waste, / the sediment of the washing out of the wheel, he cast it do/wn and mixed it in with the sea waters. Its own th[10]ought collected it together; and (the thought) gathered (the waste) together in / this w[a]y. It made it fa[s]t and fixed it [...] / The sea giant had stamped upon him the seal of the seconds a[nd the hours], / the seal of the days [and months and] / years, the impression of the stars and the signs of the zodiac*[55] [...] [15] He came into existence from them and was discharged from their power / and cast into the sea. The images and the seals and aspects and / doctrines and counsels of [...] were sealed upon the body / of that giant, because he is the residue of them all. Consequently, / each star that will shine, and each sign of the zodiac that will tu[20]rn: of one he shall be its inducement, and of another its confirmation. H/e was discharged into the sea like this, the way a cloud / might discharge rainwater into the midst of the sea. They compelled / him totally through the action of the power and the helms[man]/ship of the angels. He was swept down to the mill, the pla[ce w][25]here he was constructed in the [sett]ing up of the universe; and the / sea also conceived him [...] for its part [...] / it being his chief sculptor and chief cra[ftsma]n. It sculp[ted h]/im in a likeness, he being changed more than the other residue of the sea / bodies.

This matter is comparable with [a] craftsman who might take the stamped impressions of many co[i]/ns and cast them on the fire, and mould them [to a sin]gle image. / These thousands of impressions and thousands [of sha]pes [are perfected] / and make a single body [...] /

(115) This is also the case with the sea giant, who too was moulded / and sculpted by the power of the lust inside him / from many doctrines and counsels th/at belong to the residue of the wheel of the sphere.

The archety[pe] of the giant was constructed for three things.

The first: / That the sphere would be [re]lieved and purified of the burden pres/e[nt in] it. In the same way that the ten firmaments were purified and [re]li/eved [of] the burden of the three vessels; so / was it also done to the sphere, that it too might be relieved [and] puri[10]fi[ed] of the burden and the waste inside it. /

The second: That he might add a {fetter}[56] and a prison to the wheel / and the signs of the zodiac that are bound to it, so that when / they wish to go up above, you can find the s[e]a / giant dragging them back as by an [i]ron {fetter}, [15] and they are unable to go up; and when the powers / of the wheel would take a decision on a guileful thing, and it enters their / mind to come down to the earth, they are not able to descend because / of this stake that is nailed to the wheel upon the {}[57] / of the firmaments. This is one. However, this other one, because of its [20] sleepless watchers that are set over it, it is turned all the time. /

[The t]hird thing: That the [wind] and the water and the fire that gush from / [the] c[ircui]t of the sea, [and the r]ivers that flow upon the face of / [the ear]th discharging into the se[a], and the rainwaters that come to gr/[ound], and the wast[e] and rebirth that come [25] [dow]n to it; that sea will be a hostel / [and g]athering place for all of these.

/ Concerning the Vessels. /

The point of this chapter is the foreknowledge of the powers of light that has enabled them to prepare places to hold and contain various evil forces that arise during cosmic history, until their final imprisonment with the dissolution of the universe. Thus: three ditches for the evil vessels; the sea for the sea-giant; a place for another monster that arises from the sea, and which the Adamant vanquishes (also 136.27 – 137.4); gehennas for the waste of the darkness; 'hostels' for various evil powers who rebel; places (?) for the abortions; a prison for the watchers; cities for the giants of old.

Understand also this other (matter): Before these / vessels were discharged and swept down from heaven, fi[5]rst three ditches were fashioned and constructed for them, / in which they would be bound and fettered. /

Before the sea giant was discharged from the s/phere, the Father of Life constructed a place for [him i]n / this great sea that is within the walls, whereon the [10] ships sail, and where the fullness shall [... / ...]

/ Concerning the Ambassador. /

The point of this chapter, which connects it to the last, is again the foreknowledge of the light. Although entitled Concerning the Ambassador, his advent is actually only one of a number of discrete moments in the overall plan of the light chosen to illustrate the idea of determinism.

(1) The Third Ambassador is evoked before the beginning of time, and thus prior to the start of the process of salvation, which is his principal purpose in the drama.

(2) The sun and the moon are prepared for their tasks in the salvific process.

(3) The Judge is emanated.

(4) Christ is ordained in advance of the sects coming into existence, to render them harmless.

(5) The stars and the signs of the Zodiac determine the fates of mankind.

(6) The gods of destruction are made ready to dissolve the universe.

(7) The first architect, the Great Builder, and his angels are summoned to construct the new aeon.

Once again, hear this other lesson that I would teach you! /

Know that before night and day / were differentiated in the universe, the Third [Am]bassador was summoned. And, afterwards, he was sent to this void / and outer waste that he might purify the light, / and separate night and day from each other. /

[B]efore the light was released and freed and ascended / through this zone, the Father of Life made beautiful for it the ships of light. He constructed them so that it might be purified in them, / and be sculpted and fashioned in good order. /

[Bef]ore sin had multiplied and had made a kingdom in the flesh, before / the acquitted and the condemn[ed] were set apart from each other, / the Judge [w]as sent forth and revealed. His throne was created and placed [i]n the living atmosphere, so that he would be / [a] just Judge, so that / there the righteous and the sinners would be set apart and tested / [a]nd separated from each other.

Also, befo/[r]e the error and offence of the sects were disp[l]ayed in the universe, the blessed Chr/ist was ordained and brought forth against them, that he might render their error harmless. /

Again, [befo]re mankind had been engendered, some were named / ['rich' and] others 'poor' on earth / [...] upon them. Before they die, (118) they who will die are marked out by the stars and the signs of the zo[di]/ac in the sphere. They are appointed for them; in the[m] are their births. / And their root*58 is bound up with their zodiacal signs; and they are compe/lled by them and brought to an equal judgement in accordance with their deeds and their sins. /

Again, before the universe is dissolved, [and the] entire earth, / the destroyers were appointed and instructed for its di/ssolution.

And before the ne[w] aeon was [built and] / made be[auti]ful and marked out [the] Great Builder [w]as summoned, the first architect and the / angels who are with him, who would build and make beautiful the / new aeon.

/ Concerning the Four [15] great Things. /

The entire 'ruling-power', the collectivity of evil cosmic forces, is apportioned into the four parts of the universe. Three of these are: the ten firmaments; the eight earths; and the surrounding walls and vessels. The fourth is the wheel of the stars, and here are bound the leaders of all these evil rulers, the seven planets (although Mani's system demands the introduction of two ascendants instead of the divine sun and the moon, see 168.7 - 16) and the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Mani explains that this had to be very carefully arranged by the Father and Mother of Life, when they constructed the universe, so as to balance the leaders against their powers. He develops an extended analogy to show that a king is only equal to his retinue, who in turn are equal to the kingdom. Thus, the gods are able to keep control of the evil forces in the universe, although the stars determine the entire created order.

Once again the enlightener speaks: The wheel of the stars, whi/ch is displayed to you, is a great mighty thing! Also, it is one / among the four great things; since the whole ruli[n]/g-power is assigned to four parts.

[20] The first part is the powers who occur in the ten firmame/nts that exist above the wheel, and the rulin/g-power that is bound in them, as it is imprisoned within them in the heaven/s that are above.

The second part is / the eight earths that are below; the four that are composite, [25] and the four places of darkness. The second part / extends from this earth, upon which mankind walks, towards / the underside.

The third part is the [wa]/lls and the vessels that surround the worlds. / They are the four mountains and the three vessels; [30] with what is in them, and the ruling-power that is trapped within them, / and the powers who are masters over them.

The fourt[h] / part is the sphere of the stars that [is appointed] with [gr]ea[t] / diligence, as it is ordered in a [... m]any [...]; / that of the Father of [L]ife, [and that of the Mother of] (119) the living. Its [...] very [...] with diligence, / because of the great and cruel powers, and the titanic figures, [who are] / in it; they being suspended from it. So, all the first-born and the / leaders of all the rulers, they who were existing in the th[5]ree parts, these were garnered. They were collected together, seized, / bound and assigned on this wheel. Each was apportioned / by these three parts. They were distributed, en[twin]ed, / and weighted against their companions of the same size.

Still, for its part, the w[he]el / is equal to them in its strength; the po[wers] of [10] the enmity who are bound on it. [Ind]eed, they were suspended on [the] circling [w]he/el because of their cruelty; so that, d[u]e to / the wind and the motion in which they go round, they comp/rehend not the place wherein they are set. For if / they had been bound in the heavens, the heavens would not have had the strength [15] to support them. Again, if they had been assigned on the earths, on the / fixtures that are below, they also would not have had the strength to support them. / Rather, they were suspended from the wheel of the circling stars; so that / the power and the light that should come up from b/elow can be received, and given to the heavenly ones ab[2]ove them. Conversely, whatever will fall from above, / whether cold or hot, the wheel / of the sphere will also take it and cast it out / [u]pon the entire earth, upon all the wood.

Behold, the ordinance / of the wheel is in this form. For the powers who are entwined on the [25] wheel are like this: a king mastering his / kingdom by this mighty legionary force of all the lea/ders of the kingdom; and with all the armour / [o]f the soldiery that is collected together for him; and also with / [the] mass of the pro[perty] of the kingdom; and the beautiful lustful aspect [30] of the [wo]men who are collected together for him; together with / [...] property [...] and those cattle / [...] that have been distributed about among his r(120)etinue. Yet, if you ask about that king, he is matched / with all his retinue. His retinue, for its part, / is matched against his entire kingdom. Judgement shall come forth fr/om him, vindication and condemnation, to his entire kingdom; [5] by his wisdom, skill and strength. /

Now, just as for this king, who is matched against the measure of his entire ki/ngdom by his wisdom, skill and st/rength; so also is it for the / powers [w]ho are bound on the sphere as compared to the ruling-power, and the [10] powers who exist in the entire zone. Like the king towards his r/etinue; so too is it that this totality is gathered / to the sphere, to seven leaders, to twelve sig/ns of the zodiac. As all the cities are gathered to the king, again they gather / to the leaders of the universe. All that is done [15] in the universe above and below: the battles / and the disorders and the captivity and the hunger and the l/ust and the property; so shall they increase and diminish through / these leaders. They are the motivaters of the whol[e] created order; / the totality being gathered in to them the way that I have to[20]ld you. I have opened your eyes!

/ Concerning the Conduits. /

This long and detailed chapter is amongst the most difficult in the Kephalaia; not least because the decisive term ⲗⲓϩⲙⲉ (lihme)*[59] used in the title and throughout is unknown. Here I translate the term as 'conduit'. The import of the term ⲛⲟⲩⲧⲛⲉ ('root'), which seems to be closely related to it, is also unclear. However, the essential idea is that heavenly bodies are inextricably attached to the earthly; and that the three lihme are conduits through which the divine life can be drawn to ascend and be purified, while the demonic waste is poured down through them. In the next chapter, 49, Mani explains that these conduits are spiritual; and thus can never be entangled nor cut by the astral bodies as they turn though the heavens. The significance of the roots is deterministic; and they must also be spiritual. In chapter 46 Mani explains that mankind's 'root' is bound up with their zodiacal signs (118.3); so this could be translated as 'fate'.

120.25 – 121.12 The first conduit is the root of the powers in the heavens; and stretches from them to their bodies and carcasses that were stripped off by the Living Spirit and cast down to the earths. Therefore, the upper worlds are psychic and pneumatic (soul and spirit); while the worlds below are somatic and ptomatic (body and carcass). Life is drawn up through the conduit to be purified in the heavens; but any waste is poured back down through descending conduits.

121.13 – 17 The second conduit stretches from the heavenly cities to the five kinds of trees. For Mani vegetation was particularly rich in divine life.

*59 See the discussion in Smagina 1990:121–2; and Vycichl 1983:102.

121.17 – 32 The third conduit stretches from the evil heavenly powers to the five kinds of flesh.

121.33 – 122.4 The roots of the wheel of the stars stretch not to earth, but to the heavenly worlds. From these it receives its life.

122.5 – 15 The disciples question Mani. If the stars are not connected to earth, how do they control the fates of mankind and other life on earth?

122.16 – 123.15 Mani explains that when the Living Spirit constructed the universe, he correctly did not bind the stars to earth; although they are bound to the sea giant (see chapter 44). However, when the Ambassador displayed his image to the demons in the heavens and they ejaculated, the sperm fell down on the wheel, the earth and the sea. Subsequently all life on earth developed; and thus the stars control its destiny.

123.15 – 28 The disciples understand, and ask why one conduit is greater than another.

123.29 – 124.22 The first conduit is greatest, because it is bound in all the earths. Then the second, because much life is drawn from vegetation, the Cross of Light, which covers the whole earth. The least is that connected to mankind and other fleshly creatures, because these only cover a small part of the world in the south.

124.22 – 32 Mani's concluding comments.

Once again the enlightener speaks: There are three conduits that e[x]/ist through the entire zone, from the abyss to its heights.

[25] The first conduit is the root of all the powers a[b]/ove, they that exist in all the heavens. They are cast off / and fettered on the earths below; because the earth [be]/low is the 'stripping off', the garment and the body of the powers [th]/at are above the heavens.

For when the Father of Li[fe] [30] constructed the heavenly worlds, he di[vested th]em of their bodies, [he] / threw them to the earths below.

So, the up[per] worlds / are of the soul and the spirit; b[ut the worlds] / below are of the body and the carca[ss ...] (121) Now as for this, he [...] the powers of heaven; he se/aled it on their bodies and their carcasses that are on the earths, so that / when life comes up from the fullness of these earths, / it can be entirely drawn up to the heights in the roots of what is heavenly, th[5]at are fastened in their bodies. And also, all life can be purified in that place. / However, the waste that will be swept from the puri/fied one who ascends to the heights will be let fall to the ground / through the conduits of these conduits, and will be poured down [...] a/nd thrown to the underside. This is the first conduit, wh[10]ich comes from the powers of the heavens to their bodies and their / carcasses that are upon the earth; also, from their bodies and [their] c/arcasses that are on the earths to the powers of the heavens. /

The second conduit is the one that comes from the temples and dw/ellings and cities that exist in the heavens down to the ground, to [15] the five shapes of tree that grow upon the earth. The life comes / up from the trees to the temples and cities. Life*[60] to/o, and the residue of the heavenly ones, comes down to the trees in a / conduit.

And the third conduit is all the / powers and householders who dwell in all the firmaments, [20] whose roots come down from them to the five wo/rlds of flesh that creep upon the earth, being fixed to one another. / Now, the power and the life that shall be gathered in from the worlds / of flesh are dispersed among them in various shapes. The / powers above shall draw them to the upper side through conduits. [25] [The was]te too, and the l[u]st and the evil-doing and the anger th/[at] will be greater in the powers of [heave]n, shall be poured to the ground thr[ough] / their various conduits. They shall be discharged upon mankind / [and] the other remaining animals. When what is heavenly will wash / the waste and the stench and the poison down on the creations [30] of the flesh below, in their turn the creations shall be greate/r [i]n lust and anger and evil-doing against each other / [throug]h the action of their fathers who are on high. /

The apostle [say]s: [St]ill, look at the wheel of the stars! It has no / [root in this earth], but its roots are bound in the to[35]tality. The wheel of stars], then, receives life through the power (122) and the life that asce[nd fr]om the earths through conduits / and the firmaments above. It (also) takes life from those conduits / that receive up to the firmaments and the heavenly worlds / above it, it takes life out from that place.

[5] Then the disciples questioned the enlightener. They say to him: Look, / in that the wheel has no root in this earth, from where did the stars / and signs of the zodiac find this authority? They became masters over these five / fleshes and five trees. Even though you have told us that / the wheel has no root there! For you said to us that every [10] thing, if it can be reduced from the earth, the heavenly powers above / draw it through a conduit. Also, we see / that every thing that a person will attain, whether it be weal/th that comes into his possession or poverty that will / accrue to him, or his sickness and health; he attains it thro[15]ugh the signs of the zodiac and the star under which he shall be born*61. /

Then he says to his disciples: Nevertheless, what I proclaimed to / you, namely that the wheel has no root therein, I have recounted to / you properly. It is set aright in its position. For when / the Living Spirit, the Father of Life, constructed the heavens and [20] the firmaments above, he bound their roots in / to the earths below; in their carcasses that he had stripped / from them. Yet, when he constructed the wheel, [he] did not / bind its root in to the e[arths], but he bound the ro/ot of the wheel by the s[e]a gian[t].

And when [the] [25] Ambassador came, he displa[yed] his image / and purified and brought the light o[ut from] all [the] heavens. M[a]/tter, however, which is present in all the rulers, spurted o[ut] / against the image of the Ambassador. It went u[p] / in order to reach it, but reached it not. It dropped back and fell to the [under][30]side. Now, when it had fallen from above, it / separated out into three parts.

The first part / fell to the wheel; anoth[er part fell to the earth; an(123)o]ther part fell to the se[a. By means] of the part that fell to / the sphere, [the r]oot was bound in the trees and flesh. / Therefore, because of this, they received au[thor]ity and became masters in the five / worlds of the flesh and the five worlds of the tree. Through [5] the nat[ure] that came dow[n upo]n the wheel / the root was bound in the trees. Also, by means of the abortions / that came to the ground, another root was bound in the fleshes. Therefore, because / of this, the st[a]rs and signs of the zodiac received authority over the trees / and the fleshes: through the root of sin that fell do[10]wn; and [the ro]ot of the abortions that were aborted there, they fell / to the ground. However, the[se] other conduits that [the] Living Spirit has bo/und in the e[a]rths, they that the soul of the elements c[o]mes u/[p thro]ugh to the

The disciples of the enlightener say: / We beseech you, our master, that just as you have in/structed us and put together this lesson on [...] / you have told us about the prototype of the conduits. / The first is the one that comes from the firmaments to the earths, and [20] the one that comes from the wheel to the sea giant. / That is only one. / Concerning the Wh[eel and the Conduits]. /

The conduits are spiritual (pneumatic). Therefore, they can neither be cut by, nor entangled in, the wheel of the stars as it circles in the heavens.

His disciples say to him: Convince us, our master, ab/out this other thing. How does the wheel circle over the conduits, [5] which extend from the heavens to the earths, and it not cut them? Or why / shall the conduits not get entangled in with the wheel / as it circles and drives [... through the u]niverse? /

The enlightener says to them: The reason that the conduits shall not be cut, / for they are not cut, is because they are spiritual. Thus [10] the conduits are like the waters through which ships / sail. You shall find the prow that is in position in the / front part of the ship divides the waters, casting t[h]em back / and forth. So, when it parts the wat[ers] / and that ship opens up the water with its c[leaving] pro[w], [15] immediately and without delay the wat/ers [min]gle with each other again behind the ship; and the pa/th of the ship shall not be discernible in the midst of the waters. /

This is also the case with the wheel. It turns through the conduits and / the air. The wheel shall not cut the conduits, nor / are the conduits them[selves] entangled in the wheel.

/ Concerning these Na[mes]: God, Rich One, / and Ange[l]; who they are. /

The many divine emanations in the Manichaean system exist at various levels, depending upon their function in the overall history, and on the directness of their evocation from the supreme Father. In this kephalaion Mani distinguishes the three categories of 'god', 'rich one' and 'angel'.

He then applies these to three distinct moments: the archetypes in the eternal land of light; the emanations who have entered into time and the cosmos; and those who belong to the households of the Great Spirit, the Beloved of the Lights, and the Ambassador. This last sequence is probably intended eschatologically, these being principal figures in the three series of emanations: descent, creation and redemption.

[O]nc]e again the enlightener speaks: This one, a name is given to him in / the world. For people pronounce it with their mouths: 'go[30][d', 'ri]ch one', and 'angel'. Who are they? Who are the gods? Or / [who] are the rich ones? Or who are the angels? Who are these / [three] archetypes?

His disciples asked him. They say: T/[ell] us, our master, who they are! /

[The a]postle [speaks] to them: There are these three archetypes [35] [in the land of light, and there is no measure to] them!

[So], the ones who are call[ed] (126) 'god', are the gods whom the Father has summoned / from himself. He has establ[ished them] after the likeness / of his greatness.

which finished the analogy of the bird's flight and introduced another analogy about mankind.

Conversely, these who are named / 'rich [...]', are the evocations of the first ri[ch] go[5]ds [of] the Father; because, when the Father had summoned (the first), / they themselves summoned evocations. They called them / 'rich'.

They too, the rich ones, have summoned their / evocations. They call them 'angel'.

These are the three / [archety]pes who occur in the land of light. There is no measure to apply to [10] them!

Once again, listen! Other persons / who are named 'god' are the emanations who have / come f[r]om the Father; the evocations of the Father whom he summoned forth. / They came out to the contest and humiliated the enmity. /

Conversely, the 'rich ones' are [the ev]ocations of these first living words. [15] They too, the rich ones, have come and performed and fulfilled the plea/sure of the greatness; [in the] worlds that are above and / below.

On the other hand, the ones who are named the 'ange/ls' are the evocations of the rich ones; who had come from the three / living words. They have been sent in an embassy and [20] an apostolate to this building. They have come to the entire divinity, / which is established in silence and in hiddenness. [An]/d, also, they have come to all the souls who have been entangled in the en[emy]. / They have brought them hope and confidence.

On[ce again] / the enlightener speaks: Again, they are called 'go[d]', [25] all the gods who belong to the household of the Great Spirit. /

Conversely, the ones who are called 'angel', are al[l] the angels / who belong to the household of the Beloved of the Lights.

The ones who are called / 'rich', are all the rich ones who belong to the house[hold of the] glorious [Amb]/assador.

/ Concerning the First Man. /

The First Man descends for battle with his armour of the five light elements. These are his garments or sons, the living soul that becomes mixed with the darkness, and which ensures the final victory.

Once again our light father speaks: When the [First] / Man came forth [agai]nst the ene[my ... (127) ...] garment [...] the darkness with the garment / [of] living fire. With that garment he withered / the tumescence (?) of the enemy; he brought down i[t]s foolery / and its vanity. Now, this one alone was sufficient [5] for them. 25 Conce[rning] the [...] *64 of the Light. /

The harmony and common purpose of the divine has enabled the light to overcome, and ultimately to condemn to eternal imprisonment, the evil forces of darkness who rebelled against it. They were disunited in their attack, and thus failed; just as happens between kingdoms in this world. Mani uses this lesson to exhort harmony in truth amongst his followers.

[Onc]e again the en[li]ght[ener] speaks to his disciples: [Now as to what affects the] / light, behold, at the beginning the darkness was strong against it / [...] no disunity [...] exists in the light. /

[...] how far [... the lig]ht that came forth from [... 30 ...] in that place in a / [...] alone / [...] (128) the greatness of the light with one another for ever, / and nor did one of them transgress the command and or/der that his brother had entrusted to him forever.

However, the da/rkness, the enemy, was doomed and overcome; because 5 of the arising of disharmony it was divided within itself. Even the kin/gdom was divided within itself; [and] ev[en] the [powers, who had] left / their abyss behind and come up fo[llowing] it, were do/omed because of the disunity that was present in all of them. / The darkness was destroyed, and its other powers were humiliated, because 10 the p[ower] of that first light functions in the same way / as the kingdom of this world. As long as its [associates in the m]yste/ry*65 are in agreement with it, th[at] kingdom [...] and / they marvel at it and it receives glory, the one that [...] and it sur/passes and is even more exalted than this other kingdom, which is about [to burst out] against [it].

*64 It would be tempting to restore ϯ[ⲙⲉ]ⲧⲉ 'harmony', since the theme of the chapter is the concord of the light as opposed to the disunity among the powers of darkness: see K 128.19. The four-letter lacuna, however (if correctly transcribed) would seem to be too long for ϯ[ⲙⲉ]ⲧⲉ, and it would also be surprising to find no definite article following ⲉⲧⲃⲉ

/ Concerning the First Man. /

This chapter discusses the way that the kingdom of darkness and its powers were doomed from the time of the descent of the First Man. He snared the evil forces by his garment of living fire (see further chapter 51); and thus drew them out of their storehouses. The Living Spirit then constructed the universe out of them; and the storehouses were left barren, like a marsh when all the birds and fish have been netted.

Mani develops further analogies: this is like the human body, where the limbs depend upon the head (see also 84.21 – 25). If a limb is cut off the person remains alive; but he dies without the head. Thus, once deprived of Matter and the evil powers, the storehouses were devastated like headless limbs. Similarly, this is like a dead body, once the soul leaves it.

Once again the enlightener speaks: At the time when the First Man was sent / to the war in the first garment of / [living fire], which he gave to the first nature that ex[10][ists ...] in t[h]at single garment. / [...] he hunted Matter, the tho[ug]ht / [of death, ...] and all its other powers.

[W]hen / [the First M]an came up from the [abys]s, / [... the] Living [S]pirit brought the rulers whom he had [hun]ted [15] [...] element, that [...] of [the land of] dark/ne[ss, that] he might construct from them this universe and fashion / everything appropriate for the greatness. From that time on, / the place of the storehouses of the elements [...] / he destroyed and laid waste the [...] [20] all that were in it.

Just like a marsh, / of which the fish and birds are snared in a net, a/nd only the waters are left behind and the reeds and / the plants that grow in it, this is also the case with the store/[houses of] death. The [First] Man snared their counsels and [25] [their k]in that were [in them], and the storehouses were left b/ehind in their [dwelli]ng place.

So then, the case / [of] the land of darkness is like this, as is that of the storehouses / [t]hat were in it.

[J]ust as the body of man / has [ma]ny lim[bs] in it, [30] [the land of darkness] has [storehouses from] its beginning / [...] all [the limbs] that (130) hang from the great head of the [body]. A si[ngle] root / is the root of them all, because they all hang from / the great head that is on top of the body. Should a limb be cut / from the tip of [the]se small [h]eads, [5] the great head that is on top of them [al]l stays in / its place the way that it is [...]*67/ you find this person alive. Al[l] these sm[all h]eads / are firmly set in it [...] / Wh[en] they will cut from them [... [10] ...] all of them, these little [heads] shall [... / ...] the corpses, because they might see [... / ...] be firmly set [...] / in the body, which they joined wi[th it ...] /

In exactly this way, it is also the case [that] [15] the storehouses of darkness are the same, the things from which the [darkness gushed] / forth.

*67 For the notion that the head is the root of the limbs, and its relationship to the extremities, see also 84.21 – 24 and 280.26 – 29

Also, while that Matter / and all its other powers are present in the depths of the / store[ho]uses, they too are alive. Firmly set / were their kin in them, to do whatever they wished [20] in their storehouses. However, from the time when they took the [po]/ison of this nature, they were deprived of (Matter) and it was separated from them, / and all its powers. Those [store]houses and e[le]/-ments became inactive and were devastated, [no en]ergy wa[s in th]/em to do anything.

Just like a bod[y: When] [25] the soul shall come forth f[rom it no] energy shall be found i[n] it, / nor anything ste[ady] at all, because [the] / soul that was in it leaves and has come forth. For [i]t, the ene[r/g]y*[68], does everything [...] /

This is also the case [with ... [30] ... / [ConcernJing the Quality of the Garments. /

The Living Spirit constructs the universe out of the mixture of darkness and light resulting from the deliberate sacrifice of the five garments or sons of the First Man. This is then held in place by his own five sons. Mani compares the Living Spirit to an architect who builds a palace for a king. This metaphor is then extended: the Father of Life (i.e. the Living Spirit) as a perfect carpenter, and the Ambassador as king in this universe.

[Once again] the enlightener [speaks]: At the time when the F[ir]st / [Man ...] he gave the leadership to his five [sons / ... the] Living [S]pirit and the Mother of Life [...] [15] as the entire ruling-power is entwined and crucified [... / ...] they were poured out

5 Concerning the Fashion/ing of Adam. /

133.7 – 135.26 Since Adam and Eve were fashioned by the evil rulers, after the image of the Ambassador displayed in the heavens, some of the disciples believe that the human figure must have divine approval. Mani explains that this is not the case. The Ambassador displayed his image so as to free the living soul from Matter in which it was entangled. The human image is merely a copy of the divine, fashioned in lust, and very imperfect. Mani develops a parable about a beautiful and noble woman who is forced to come out from her honourable seclusion, and display herself to the lust of every man, in order to help her beloved brother.

135.27 – 136.20 In a similar way not only mankind, but also many other powers in the universe, have received the stamp of the divine image. This image could not have originated from the worlds of darkness.

136.20 – 137.11 Not all forms of life have been generated from sexual intercourse. Mani gives three examples: the sea giant; a second monster that rises from the sea and is overpowered by the Adamant; vegetation. Like mankind, these also were not brought by the King of Darkness into the universe. Instead, they are composite forms of life that come into being during the history, and thus are not solely the products of either good or evil.

[Once more his] disciples questioned the glorious one. They say to [him: / There are some amo]ng us telling us that / we [know (?) ...] that the (Ambassador) consents about [10] [tha]t f[igure] of flesh; he who shall be fashi[oned / ...] at another time. And next, he says: / [The Ambassa]dor displayed his image in / the un[iverse. The] rulers and the powers of the universe saw / h[is image], and they formed their shapes after his [15] likeness, who are Adam and Eve. Behold, you (pl.) see that / g[o]d con[sen]ts to its happening; because of this, he has dis/played his image to the rulers; and they constructed [... / ...] If he was not consenting to humankind, he would not have / uncovered his image, nor they fashioned [20] mankind after his likeness! /

[The]n speaks the glorious one to his disciples: Regarding the Amb/assador, the occasion when he came displaying his image, / he [d]id not come so th[a]t he might reveal his image to the ru/[l]ers in the universe. Rather, he came and displayed [25] to the universe be[cause of h]is soul and his son, who is / [...] every [...], that he might enable him to live [... / an]d make for him a release; and to free (the soul) from / every bond and all the fetters, in which it is entangled and bound. /

Still, you, look and see! The ru[30]lers and the authorities, in that they had no form in / [...] him, they lusted for his (134) image. They reflected upon themselves, that [they] had no [one] / like him in their creation. They sealed hi[s im]a[g]e / in their heart, within their soul. Afterward[s, they] / built it according to his likeness; they formed Adam and [Ev]e. [5] They sealed the image of the exalted one in their [soul]. So, they / [co]pied with an imitation; but they have not [copied i]n / truth! Rather, just as [... / ...] it is made as these, for [i]t came [...] / but it is not l[ik]e him in truth. [Again, so too] [10] is this figure of ma[nkind. They copi]/ed it against the image of the exalted one [...] /

Similarly the [t]ree, for while it is like the [... it is] not [copi]/ed in truth.

This matt[er is comparable to] / this: As a great, fre[e] woman [... [15] ...] within her [... / ...] rich in wealth [...] po[ss]essions; / she is also beautiful in her beauty, and is virtuous in her / modesty. She walks in a free and reputable position. / The fame of her beauty has spread in every c[i][20]ty. She sur[passes ...] Behold h[er] / chamber [...] one who is mad, because [of] / the nobles and the great ones. Al[so], they lust / for her beautiful face. They did not [...] her, because / she is hidden in her palace [... [25] ...] within in a [...] / meet that woman [...] his so[n]; / or rather the head [... t]hat garment. / This free woman shall [...] leave the cha[mber] / behind her and come to the street [...] her head [...] [30] and she reveals her [face and her beauty ... (135) ...] because of her beloved broth[er]. This wom/an, on whom no man ever looked, nor did they ever see / her fa[ce], as she neither desires nor rejoices [... / ...] leave her chamber behind her, and come in the midst of [5] mankind [...] and everyone view her. The / hones[t] men and the nobles, even the servants too, and the / [... l]ook at her.

In accord with this simile: Again, [this] too [is] how / [...] the Ambassador becomes [... / ...] as this free woman [... not] according to wantonness, in pride, nor / [... she co]nsented to the outer world, she [... / ...], she revealed her face and her [beau]ty / [...] but only due to the constraint of grief / [about] her [bel]ov[ed one].

Now, this too is the way of the Third Ambassador, when he came / and display[ed his] image with a show towards all the powers. / [He did] not [co]me so that all the rulers and the author/[it]ies would sculpt a form [after h]is likeness. R[ather], / he came because of his son being crucified in the totality; [fo]r he would release him, free him, and rescue him from / oppression. Yet, when the rulers looked o[n] him, / [th]ey lusted for his image. They fashioned after his / [like]ness Adam and Eve, without the consent of the gre/[at]ness.

Now, behold, I have e[nl]ightened you [about the answe]r to this question, for which you asked; that y/[ou may] happen to commit it to memory. /

[Understa]nd also this other (matter) that I will teach you. For, [a]s / with Adam and Eve, whom the rulers fashioned and / [se]aled after the image of the exalted one, so too this [i]s how a manifold divinity and many powers / [and] angels [... received] the stamp of that image, (136) which was displayed to them. For, in the majesty of the l[ig]/ht and (the image's) love, they glowed with their desire and they were undone. / Th[ey] were eager for their lust; like a m[an who looks] / to the majesty of a lusted after face, and [...] and he is eager for the {}*72 of the desire.

This is [als]o the case / with those powers, when they looked on that majestic / and beautiful [imag]e, they {} [...] / a first image. They received the stamp of th[at image], / which was displayed to them. They copied [... wh]ich th[ey co]pied out in a likeness, it being made [... / ...] the ones that they had put forth, which had received a [stamp of this im]/age; but inward even to the rocks [... / ...] which occur from place to place. The {} of that image, /

/ [Concern]ing Saklas and his Powers. /

137.15 – 138.19 Consequent to the previous chapter this kephalaion begins with the question as to how Adam and Eve received the seal of the image of the Ambassador, even though they who fashioned them (led by Saklas and his consort as in other accounts) had not themselves directly seen this image. Mani explains that sinful Matter, which had originally seen the image during the seduction episode, led directly through its subsequent generation to those who shaped Adam and Eve. Thus the seal of the image was retained.

138.20 – 141.14 The next section is essentially a separate kephalaion, loosely linked to the previous passage. In repetitive style Mani explains how the various human senses take in, retain, and can then produce from memory ('storage facilities') earlier perceptions. In an excursus (140.22 – 141.1) he comments that the heart governs the senses, and develops two brief similes.

141.14 – 142.11 Spiritual entities guard the gates of the senses (the orifices of the body) like watchmen at a camp. This understanding of the body as the micro-cosmos full of powers is characteristic of Manichaeism.

142.12 – 143.32 When the Light Mind enters the body, transforming the old man into the new (see ch. 38) it takes over the control of the senses, oppressing the old guard that were directed by sin. Now the senses close to the perceptions of lust, and are open to righteousness. In the final part of this section (143.24 – 32) the rule of the Light Mind is referred to as that of the Holy Spirit, an unusual and interesting shift in terminology.

144.1 – 12 Mani concludes by exhorting his hearers always to guard their senses, secure in righteousness, so as to attain the rest or peace that is eternal salvation.

[O]nc[e again the di]sciples questioned the e[n]lightener. They say to him: 15 All [these a]bortions, am[o]ngst them are Saklas and his / consort and the ones whom they have served [...], they are the ones that shap/ed Adam and Eve. How did they find this beautiful image / laid over their shape, even though when it was / displayed to their fathers they were not in existence? They never saw 20 the image of the Ambassador! And how did they take / the seal of the image of the Ambassador? They added it to / [the] shape of Adam and Eve. /

The enlightener [speak]s to them thus: The sin that spur/ted out from the rulers, which is Matter, shot up 25 [tow]ards the image of the Ambassador. It was cut off from [tha]t place / and came down to the earth, for they did not accept / [it wi]thin the firmaments. When it came do/[wn to] the earth, it formed the tree. It was established / within the wood and formed the fruits. And when 30 [the] abortions fell [to] the ground, to the earth, at the [second] time / [... / ...] (138) fruits, it assumed the[m] and spoke in the ruler, / their leader. He says to his companions: Come! Give me yo/ur light, and I will construct for you an image aft[er] / the likeness of the exalted one. What he said, they did: they gave [5] it to him, and he constructed [...] /

Again the enlightener says: The sin that s[purted out ... / ...] which is the Matter that saw the im[age of the Ambassa]/dor and that formed the tre[e and was established i]/n [i]t; afterwards it came up in the [fruits ...] [10] It went in to the rulers [...] they / formed Adam and Eve after the [likeness of the] exalt[ed one]. / Through the energy of the sin that had s[een the image of the] / Ambassador, it went into the (rulers) [through the fruits. It] / assumed them and they [t]oo sculp[ted ... they] [15] begat each of them according to his destiny [...]; / one he resembles, one he does not resemble.

Behold, I have taught y/ou this lesson, how the rulers shaped Adam and / Eve by the action of the sin that went into the[m] / through the fruits, and he was ordained after the image of the exalted one.

[20] Once again the enlightener speaks: The moulder placed in the / form of Adam and Eve limbs, outside and wi/thin, for perception and activity. He*[73] was apportioned / house by house*[74]. For everything that his perceptions and / elements will receive externally there are internal storehouses [25] and repositories and caviti[es; and] / what is received in to them is stored in them. [When]/ever they will be questioned about what is deposited in their internal store/houses, they bring out what they have received within a/nd give it to the questioner who requested it of them.

[30] In this way his faculty*[75] [...] / outer [limbs] to look at [...] / every type with[in ...] also the faculty of the eyes [has] houses and caviti/es and repositories and stores within, so that every image / it might see, whether good or evil, whether / loveable or detestable or lu[5]stful, it can receive into its storehouses and / repositories. Also, when the faculty of the / eyes is pleased to send out the image that it saw / and took in, it can go in to its storehouses [at the] / time and think and seek [...] [10] and it brings it out [and] gives it to the questioner who requested it / and the one who wan[t]ed it. Whether it be something from / lu[st*76 ... or a]n image of love [or ... / ... something] hateful. And thus shall that faculty (of the eyes) / produce and do what it does in each category.

15 The faculty of the ears has its own storehouses / also. Every sound it might receive, whether good or evil, / shall be taken in and placed in its houses and inner repositor/ies, and it is guarded in its [...] for a / thousand days. After a thousand days, if someone comes and 20 asks that faculty about the sound that it heard / [at] this time and took into its storehouses, immediately / it [sh]all g[o] into its repositories and seek and review / and search after this word, and send it out from where it / was first put, the place in which it was kept.

25 [In] like order, the faculty of scent / [s]hall function just as that of the eyes and that of the auditory organs. / Every [o]dour it shall smell it shall take in [to it] and / [d]eposit in its inner storehouses. Every time it will be / [a]sked by a questioner, it shall go in 30 [...] and [...] storehouse and remember / [...] (140) only these things.

However, even the mouth and the tongue within it, / and the taste organ, have a faculty dwelling in them. / Again, that faculty too, o/f taste, has thus cavities and repositories 5 set apart for it. It too receives these tastes and gathers them / in. A[nd] at any moment when someone will ask of a taste, if / [...] it shall send it out and remember tha[t] taste. / It shall snare and give even the mar[k of] th[a]t taste; / give its memory to the qu[est]ioner who asks for it.

10 Again, the fac[ul]ty of touch by the hands is also s[o]: / When it might touch, touch shall [receive i]ts memory. / And it [takes] it in to its inner repository [until] / som[eo]ne will ask this faculty for the memory. [Immediately], / it shall go in again and bring out the memory of this tou15ch that it made, and give it to whoever asks for it. /

And the faculty of the heart that rules over them all is much / the most like this. Every thing that these five fac/ulties will receive and put in store for / the faculty of the heart it shall receive and guard. [20] Any time that they will ask for their deposit it shall send out / and give every thing that they gave to it. /

For the counsel of the heart is like the king. / All the ad[v]isers*[77] of his city and the leaders of his a[r]/my are placed with him. Any time if his genera[ls] [25] will entreat him for whatever they wish, he shall give them the ad[v]/ice and opinion by which they move. /

Furthermore, it is like a cellarman: [Eve]ry thing that / will be entrusted to it by them, and given to it, it shall receive / and put in separate vessels and places. Any time [30] [... / ... / ...] (141) in the place that it put it.

This also is the way of / the faculty of the body. The vision that the eyes will se/e and give to it, and it receives it in, it shall bring out again / from the storehouses wherein it had placed it; and give it to whoever asks for it.

[5] Again, [the] sound that the ears will hear and give to it, / and it receives it from them. At any time when someone will ask it for that so/und, it shall bring out and give the sound of the ear[s] / to whoever has asked it for that sound. It shall bring out and / give the sound of the ears to whoever has asked.

[10] Again, [the] faculty of smell in this same pattern; and that of taste / i[s] of the same [ty]pe. The touch by the han[ds ... / ...] they shall bring it out in to [... / ...] And whenever they will as[k it] for it, it shall bring it out / and gi[ve it].

Once again the enlightener speaks: [15] Indeed, watchmen are a[t] these doors guarding them, / and bolts are fastened on the doors at the hands of the gu/ards that guard them!

Just like watchmen guarding a c/amp with towers and watchposts. As the holding rooms come*[78] / out from there and the bolts are upon the gates, the guar[20]ds control the bolts of the gates while they sit at the entrance / [of] the watchposts. So, someone who

However, the foreigner / who comes they shall prevent, and leave him stand[25][i]ng at the gate. They shall not yield to let him enter. / Again, another one whom they will receive in, with great trouble before / [they] take him in, you shall find many holding rooms [... / ...] that [...] there are a mass [... / ...] them. The number of d[oor] bolts [30] [...] are [...] Whenever someone will wish / [...] the bolts at his hand, opens (142) the gate and brings out whoever is hidden within. /

The enlightener says: This body too is like the mighty c/amp. And the gates of the camp with / their guards are like the orifices and organs [5] of the body. Now, the orifices of the body are of sight, / hearing and smell; and they that send o/ut words. There are many sentinels and a ma/ss of guards placed over the limbs of the body, guarding / their orifices. And the faculty in it is the di[10]rective of the body, the queen of the entire camp; so that / whenever it wishes it can open, or when it wishes it can shut. /

However, if and wh[en] the Light Mind comes, it shall tu[rn i]n / to the orifices of the body. The rulers, who [a]re the door gua[rds], / shall h[in]der and restrain it from en[ter]ing. [15] They shall bind the circu[it] of the body so that the foreign[er] can not / enter it.

Nevertheless, the Light Mind / by its wisdom and awe and diligence shall hum/ble the guards who are set at the body's orifices. / When it finishes humbling them it shall take fr[o]m them bolts [20] to all the orifices of the body. Now, the orifices that had been ope/ned before to the parades of lust, to receive i/n the sights of pleasure, to transfer the [wor]/ds of the practice of li[f]e's concerns, to receive in the t[astes] / of the different foods and unclean meals together [25] with the sin therein; whoever stops receiving th[is] in, / his heart and mind shall follow after.

So, now, bec[ause] / the b[olt]s to the body of the righteous person are in the hands of / the Light M[in]d within, he is open [to receive] / i[n] all that is pleasing to God. He is op[en to take] i[n] [30] by his eyes the visions of lov[e ...] and / righteousness. Indeed, due to this, the si[ghts and] the [ad]ornme[nt of the gar] (143) ments of kings, which are woven with gold; and the garments of silken wom/en, which are woven with gold and pearls, / made beautiful for the shape of lust; first they were lovable / before the eyes of the chosen person. Yet, now, by the 5 power of the Light Mind that has suffused him and / lived in the body he has humbled lust, the goddess of the bo/dy. The parades of lust have become loathsome in the presence of the righteous pers/on. However, the aspects of divinity a[nd] / righteousness and humility and scorned clothes are pleasing to him.

10 Again, [these] ears were first opening to empty sounds an/d to the melodies of lust, to the secrecies of [wic]kedn/ess. All these were pleasing at first, at the time when he / he[a]rd them. Yet, now, by the power of the Light Mind, / the sounds of lust and the words o15f magic and evil mysteries have become loathsome in his presence; / as he is not pleased to hear them from this time on. Rather, he likes all the time / to listen to the sounds of the lessons of righteousness, the / words of the psalms and of the prayers, the praise of the hy/mns and the lessons of truth, and the knowledge of charity. 20 [S]imply, all orifices in similar fashion were opening / at one time to wickedness, but now have opened / to the good. Sin was ruling in the body / this time, doing anything it liked, having none in command. /

Yet, [n]ow, authority has been taken from the sin in the org25ans of the body. The Living Spirit*79 has become lord over all its / limbs. It has bound them with a chain of peace, and se/aled them with the seal of truth. It has opened the orifices of the / body to the good, and because of this the good enter/s them through the ears and the eyes. It dwells in the heart. The H[o]ly Spirit 30 reigns. It does all that it pleases. It annuls / [the] will of [s]in, the beginning and the end. [In contrast], the will / of the [Hol]y Spir[it] comes about, and the purpose of the Light Mind.

(144) The enlightener speaks: About this I tell you my / brothers, my loved ones and my limbs. With wisdom / and skill make yourselves secure at the circuit of the body's orifices, so that the sin that dwells in the body has no power 5 over you. Nor does it take from you your light, nor / scatter it from place to place, nor

/ Concerning the Generation of Adam.

The structure of this chapter evidences yet again how Mani, as a good teacher and preacher, is able to turn an explanation of the details of his intricate system into a more immediate lesson for his audience.

144.15 – 146.8 Mani explains to a Babylonian catechumen that Adam and the people of the first human generations were greater in size, and longer-lived, because of the stars under which they were born.

146.8 – 147.17 Mani introduces a second and more compelling theme. In these last days the quality and span of people's lives has come down to almost nothing. This is because the divine life and light in the world has grown less and less.

15 Once again, a Babylonian catechumen questioned the en-l/ightener, saying to him: Speak with me my master, and in-s/truct me about Adam, the first man. When / he was fashioned, how did they sculpt him? / Or, how did they beget him? [Rath]er, is his beget20ting like the begetting that is brought forth today, amongst hum/ankind; or not? Does a distinction exist between his bir/th and the one that they bring forth today?

Now, no[te] that A/dam is mighty in his stature, and great is his / size. Even his years are many! He spent many years 25 living in the world. And he is not the only one / we have found to be mighty; but all the others who were / begotten in his generation, many are their years too. Still, these / people who are born today, their st[a]tu/re has been diminished in po[w]er; even their years are lessened. Also, [wh]30y is the birth today, of [the]y who are born, / altered compared with that of these first [...] (145) place to place? See, even the stars and signs of the zodiac continue / in their positions. Why now have the age and / the years of these last ones diminished, and he has also become smaller, / compared to these ancient ones who belong to these first generations?

[5] And for his part our enlightener, in his deep wisdom / and his great understanding, speaks to this catechu/men who had questioned him: They increased, have turned, and diminished; / because there are five types of authorities and / leaders appointed in the sphere of zodiacal signs, and the hea[10]vens above it. They have names they are ca[lled] / by: the first name is the year; the sec/[on]d is the month; the third is the day; the fou/[rth] is the hour; the fifth is the moment. Now, these five / positions, and these five houses, exist in the sphere and [15] the heavens. These places have five powers, and they are made masters o/ver them. The master of the year exists; the master of the month exists; / the master of the day exists; the master of the hour exists; / the master of the moment exists. In turn one is above his / companion; and in turn the one above is made the master over the one below [20] him.

So, mankind is begotten, and [the ani]/mals. They are born in these powers. And, thus, these powers / have received authority since the beginning of creation till the end of the wo/rld. Now, in the beginning of the generations the powers who were masters / over the years reigned. Therefore, because of this, the offspring [25] [b]orn in their generations and their lifetime: their ye/ars were found to be greater. They attain a long life span in the generation of Adam, and / [tha]t of Sethel his son, and that of the ones who came after him.

Af/ter they ceased to reign, namely the powers who are masters over the ye/ars; the powers who are masters over the months themselves reigned. Like [30] the months, for they are less than the years; again this [is] also the case / with the offspring w[ho were] born in them. Their life span is less / [than the life span of the ones born] in the generation of the powers who master (146) the years!

When the authority of the powers who / master the months was completed; the powers of the days received authority af/ter them. Therefore, like the days, for they are less than the months, / this also is the case with the offspring who were born in them. Their life span [5] is less than the life span of the ones born in the powers who are masters / over the months. Again, even so the offspring who were born in the ho/urs, and of the moments. Their {conduit}*81 is less than that of the m/onths and the days.

Our enlightener speaks to that Babylonian cate/chumen: Do you see, how near the en[10]d [of] the world approaches? The life span of the pe[o]/ple has drawn in to nothing. Their days have diminished. Their ye[ars] have / become less; because the life and the ligh[t that] / was in the world in these first generations was more than that of to/day. Indeed, because of this have they diminished in their stature. Their lif[15]e span has become less for them.

Once again speaks this Baby[l]onian cate/chumen to our enlightener: I entreat / you, my master! How you have instructed and persuaded / me in respect of the years! Why the ye/ars of these ancients increased; or again why [20] these last ones have lessened. You also told me that they have diminished even in their / stature. You say that all these diminished becau/se of the life and the light that was taken from the world.

Now, can y/ou recount to me this other (matter): By what sort of birth was / the entire offspring of mankind made from one man and one [25] woman, Adam and Eve?

The enlightener speaks to that ca/techumen: While well do you ask for this les/son, so yet know and understand it! For the manner of these / first generations is that they are richer in their light and pu/rer in stature. Even their years are greater. Thus, again, [30] even their offspring is much more than the offspring of this tim[e]. / They were spending a longer time [...] in [the w]/omb of their mother. Afterwards, they [...] (147) a number in a single womb. There are times five were brought forth / from a single womb, and times six were brought forth from [a] single w/omb! There are some lesser than this; again, some / greater than this. Indeed, because of this the offspring of Eve multipl[5]ied, and of her children. The earth was filled by reason of them alone; b/ecause the offspring from the generation of the people of old, who they / bore into the world, differ greatly from those of today. / Their conception and their birth is not like latter births, / brought forth nowadays from the wo[ma]n's uterus.

[10] For, they whom they beget today, in these la[st] generations, they / stand diminished and maimed. And, indeed, one by one do they bri[ng t]/hem [forth] from a single womb. Hardly two, or [l]es/s or more. They are even made ugly in their aspect, being diminished in / their size, and feeble in their limbs. Their teachings and [their] [15] considerations are full of wickedness, they are evil. They are drowning, / and they end their life span suffering. Even death catches them / in haste.

When that catechumen had [lis]/tened to these lessons, he paid homage and gave glory. He says to the enlightener: / I thank you, my master, for you have satisfied my heart, and [pers][20]ua-ded me by an exhortation, about these things for which I questioned you.

/ The Four Powers that grieve. /

Characteristic of Manichaeism is its emphasis upon the real suffering of the divine, occasioned by the assault of evil. In this it differs markedly from the docetic tendencies of many gnostic systems. Indeed, Manichaeism universalised the degradation and crucifixion throughout Matter of the 'son of God' (the living soul) to an extent that seemed shocking to its Christian commentators.

In this chapter Mani relates the grief of the Mother of Life, the First Man, and himself as apostle, for their children according to their respective levels of concern. He also comments that he grieves not only for the sufferings of his church; but even for those souls who have not received the truth, and who will be damned for ever.

Contrary to the title the text seems only to deal with three powers, although there are four sources of grief.

[O]nce again the enlightener speaks to his disciples: I am one / of they that grieve, amongst these three powers that are heart-broken, [25] who have come from the Father.

The first who grieves is the first M/other of Life. She is sad because of her children who are s/et in affliction, for they were conjoined with the darkness and the / [poi]son. They have been bound with the entire ruling-power. For what was she grieving, / [wa]tching over them taking these afflictions? Whenever she might [30] [s]ee them and how suffering is brought upon them, she shall grieve and be unhap[py] on account of them. /

[The s]econd one who is troubled [of] heart is the First Man, whose / [great]ness and kingdom is established in the li[ght] ship / [...] And he too is troubled of heart because of (148) his five sons who are set in the midst of dan/ger. For any time he may see that they are given trouble / {}*82 always he might hear the sound of their / weeping as they cry out because of the blows and wo[5]unds of the enemy who assaults them daily; and as he sees them / like this constantly, he shall g[ri]eve and mourn on account of his / [s]o[n]s.

The third one who grieves am I. / For since the time when I came into the world there has been no joy / for me therein, on account of the holy church that I [10] chose in the name of my Father. I have freed it from the / slavery of the authoritarians, and placed in it / the Light Mind. Always, as I see i[t i]n / tribulation and persecution and being afflicted by its enem[ies], / I will be sad on its behalf. I have also another grief [15] apart from this: for the souls who have refused hope / and have not made themselves strong in this certainty and firmness of / [tru]th. They will come forth and be lost and go to ge/henna for ever. Indeed, due to this I grieve for them in that they have / not accepted repentance, nor have they been reconciled with the right hand o[20]f peace and mercy that I brought from the Father.

/ The Chapter of the Ele/ments that wept. /

This chapter continues from the last the theme of the suffering of the divine. The five garments or sons of the First Man, that is the light elements, must weep and feel the pain of loss four times during the course of their necessary task. That is, to mix with Matter, and to overcome its assault on the light.

148.29 – 149.3 When they first caught sight of the darkness, and understood the task that they would have to undertake.

149.4 – 13 When the First Man their father ascended from the abyss, and left them behind in mixture.

149.14 – 28 When the Living Spirit stripped off the three garments of activity (wind, water and fire, see chapter 30) in the depths of the cosmos, and they realised that they would have to rise up through all the levels of the universe before purification and salvation could be achieved.

148.29 – 151.1 When the Last Statue will ascend, and they weep for those souls who are eternally lost and bound in the darkness. This moment is much the worst, because it is final. Some of the divine itself can never be redeemed. It is for this reason, to preach the truth and thus to minimise everlasting loss, that all the apostles and divine powers surrender themselves to every affliction in the world.

Mani concludes with a final admonition about the utmost gravity of this matter.

Once again he speaks to his disciples: The garments, [25] the sons of the First Man, wept bitterly three times. / Then they were silent. There is a fourth time of weeping, / for they will weep at the end. And then their crying can stop, / and they will never again weep from this time on. /

Now, the first time of their weeping*[83] is [30] when they had seen the darkness, the enemy being about to burst out against them. / They understood everything that would happen to them. They were aware of / the one that would rise and come upon them, [b]/ut by necessity they hastened to h[i]m and [fought] (149) with him. They mastered him, they detained him. [They / bou]nd him with their body and their limbs, they o[ver/ca]me his death and his fire and his dark[ness]. /

*83 Lit: the first weeping in which they wept.

[The] second time that they wept is [w5hen the]ir father, the First Man, [ascend]ed from the [abyss] / of darkness and left them behind; that is the time when he stripped [them off] / and left them below. Indeed, when th[ey] / s[aw] how the First Man had risen out of the abyss / and [l]eft them behind, and that they were abandoned in the enmit[y, th]ey 10 wept and were sore of heart. Still, what could they do, wishing [... / ...] their heart to every affliction. They [remained b]e/hind and grew [s]ick under the pressure of the weighty burden of all the / works, until the end time. /

[The] third time that they wept is when the Living Spirit 15 stripped off the three garments of activity, / placing them beneath all things. He gave / them a sign to lift their heads and rise to the / heights from that place; and to pass and journey / through all the earths until they should reach the land of tranquilli[t]y 20 and peace, the place of rest prepared for them. So, when / they had seen him, that he had separated himself from them, while they themselves / remained behind after him and had not ascended; at that mom/ent when they stayed behind these three garments wept. / After their crying, they turned their 25 [hear]t to all the heights that were concealed from them, and were of one mind. For / [they would] soar up and come to the heights; and pass over / all [th]ings until the time that was ordained for them all / [...] at the end of the worlds. /

[The f]ourth time when they will weep is when the 30 [S]tatue will be taken up on the last day, and they will weep / [for] the souls of the liars and blasphemers; for they may give / [...] because their limbs have been severed / [...] of the darkness. And also [th]ose souls, (150) when the Statue will go [up / and th]ey are left alo[n]e, they will weep in that they will rema[in] b/[eh]ind in affliction for ever. For they wi[ll be cut / off] and separated from the Last Statue. An[d it is] 5 a necessity to take these souls who are ready for loss / [a]s retribution for the deeds that they have done. They go i[n to] this / [darkne]ss and are bound with the darkness; just as they desired it / an[d] loved it, and placed [t]heir treasure with it. At that very moment, / when the Last Statue rises u[p], 10 the[y wi]ll weep. And then they will scream out loud because they will / be severed from the company of this great Statue. And they / remain behind for ever. This great weeping [...] / is terrible, it occurs in front of the souls and [...] / who are ready for loss in accordance with their deeds. And they [will] weep [15] with that crying, they will never be silent; / because they will not attain rest from this time on. /

So, they too are the garments of these elements. This fou/rth time of weeping is heart-rending for them. It is much w/orse for them than these other three times of weeping before. This f[ou[20]rt]h time the weeping is not for themselves. Rather they weep and are heartsore for these soul[s] / who will be cut off from peace, because rest will / not come about for them, to allow them to rest from torment for / ever.

Therefore, due to the result of the erring of so/uls, all the apostles and the fathers, the reve[25]alers of the good and the true prophets, surrender [themselves] / to every labour and every aweful necessity. So that the (souls) might be / saved from the second death. Not a single one of all the a/postles wished to receive his reward on eart[h]; / but spent all their time in affliction, [30] suffering and being crucified in their body, so that they might r[e]/deem their souls from that loss [and] / ascend to this eternal rest [... in the] new aeon.

It is not prop[er ...] the wi/se person must constantly be attentive to this lesson, becau/se (this matter) is heartrending and grief for the gods and / the apostles.

/ [Concernin]g the Four Fathers; / what they are like. /

Mani uses the analogy of the corporeal body to show that some of the divine teachings are visible in the universe, but others are hidden; like organs and faculties that can or can not be seen. Thus, the Father is like the directive faculty (ϲϐⲱ) of the body, hidden in his own kingdom. However, the two light ships of the sun and the moon are the eyes of the body, seen and seeing. The living soul, despite its apparent silence, is like the body; for it can be grasped and struck and wounded. Jesus the Splendour is the tongue, because he can speak about and explain everything, whether it is visible like the ships, or hidden like the eternal kingdom. Therefore, it is Jesus who makes visible the suffering and the healing of the soul.

Once again the apostle [s]peaks to his disciples: / J[u]st as [the] corporeal body has limbs [10] that are hidden, so it also has others that are visi[b]le. [They] / ca[n be seen] upon it, they can be grasped and receive blows and woun/[d]s, whilst [ot]hers can neithe[r] be grasped no[r / receive] blows. So it is also with this entire greatness, as we resemble it. / Some of it is hidden, [15] whilst some of it is visible; [so]me of it is fa/r away from the blows and suffering, whilst some of it / receives blows and wounds.

Now, thus the directive of the bo/dy that lives within, hidden in the storehouses inside / the body and unseen. So it i[20]s also how the Father, the God o/f truth, exists; as he too is hidden in his kingdom, not display/ed before this outer desolation.

Thus, too, / the body has two eyes that are visible and see/n, and are even the body's source of illumination; so there are also [25] these two light ships that shine and are see/n in the entire universe and the whole of creation. / The light has never been hidden, just like the two eyes of the bo/dy.

The living soul too is like this, / it is established in apparent silence. In [30] its apparent [s]ilence it is grasped and receives b/lows from these five fleshes, which destroy (the soul) and str/[ike it. It can] be likened to the mystery of the [corporeal] body, / as it can be grasped and mastered, (152) can receive blows and wounds.

Also, thus / this tongue that speaks, proclaims, reprimands and reveals / about everything happening in this body, in<side and outside, also the considerations [a]nd bod[ily] knowledges>. / The tongue, which is outside, makes it manifest. It also proclaims about [5] the honour and shame of the body. And it speaks, / unveiling the pain of the body [th]at is [s]ick [from] / its sores.

This is also what [Jesus] the Splend[our] / is l[i]ke, who shall be sent fr[o]m the greatness. / He manifests and reveals about everything, both the external and [10] the internal, both what is above and what is [bel]o[w]. / Be it about the outer aeons that are hidden and [not disp]l[ayed], / or about the ships of light that are se[e]n. H[e is the on]/e who unveils about them. He is also the one who reveals [about the]ir glo/ry, and the greatness that dwells in them. And regarding this beating [15] and wounding of the living so[ul], Jesus is the one who reveals it. / He also preaches ab[o]ut (the soul) and its peace. He revea/ls about its cleansing and healing.

Behold, I have shown / to you the power of revelation of these four fathers, and how / each one of them has his appointed work, whether in [20] secret or visible.

/ Concerning the Garment of the Waters: / how great is its Measure. /

The value of this chapter lies in its historical reference; and in the way it enables the reader to penetrate the rather dense cosmological language used in the Kephalaia about the elemental garments.

Mani and three of his disciples were stood upon the bank of the Tigris while in flood. One disciple asks the apostle about the source of these vast and powerful waters. Mani then explains that the First Man assumed the elemental garments, including that of water, and used them to combat the immeasurable demonic army that had assembled to assault the light. The evil powers were overcome and bound within the universe; which itself will be destroyed at the end time. As a portion of that flood of water poured into the demons the Tigris is next to nothing. Therefore, the disciples should marvel and be secure in the power and greatness of God.

Once again, at one of the times when the apostle entered [in] [25] to the presence of King Shapur. He gave him a greet[ing], / turned, and went away from before King Shapur.

He st[o]/od on a quayside that was built upon the bank of the mighty river / Tigris. At that time it was the month of Ph[ar]/-mouthi. The river Tigris was engorged with many waters; [30] it had {surged up}*84 and swelled and {burst forth}*85 beneath the great / force of the flood, so that the waters flowed do[wn ... and] / poured into the gates of the city, they [...] (153) only, but the waters flowed into the {}*86 of / the city until they submerged the market place of the city. [...] / are few and the city goes [under ... comes to] / be fear of its wind. Even his kingdom was in great terror because of the enormous size of the flood of these waters. /

So, the apostle was standing there on the quay, w/ith also three disciples standing by him, [le]/aders of his church. They were watching the river engorged / with these many waters. They saw that the waters rose up against the city walls, and the flood was even inside / the walls.

One of his disciples then spoke. He says to the apos/tle: H[o]w great is the power of the garment of the wat/er[s]? How far shall [it extend]? That it should enter with the roar of its flood and / fill th[is] river Tigris in its vastness like the mighty [s]ea! It has carried waves from river bank to bank, and run from / wall to wall. The source from which a[l]l these waters burst forth, / how great will it be? For they come and come each year at their [ap]poin/ted season!

Then the apostle says to him: / Why are you astonished at the vastness of the Tigris waters, and why are you amazed by its flood? Still, listen t/o what I am about to tell you, and be truly astonished about th[e r]iv[er] / that came into being during the first time. /

[At] the time when the First Man assumed the elements, and stood / [fi]rm against the first enmity that had come about in the darkness, he defied these great and powerful rulers. They / are immeasurable, greater than the extent or size / of thousands and ten thousands of {parasangs}*87. At the start, when he spread the fight a/[ga]inst them, he gave them fire and wind; and afterwards he gave / [the] garment of the waters to the rulers of death. So they, the rulers, drank in and consumed those waters; / [the way that I told] you in the Great Gospel. / Many [waters] poured forth from the garment of waters / [...] the rivers flow. The mouth of the rulers / [...] those [...], the warriors of destruction [35] [... l]aboured and brought them forth. There were seven (rivers), (154) like the great river Tigris [that you] see, / flowing in to the mouth of each one of them, as they shall not / [...] to a single stomach, to their fill; because / in turn the descent to its stomach shall burn them with its [5] fire and heat. Those rulers were like / the {}*88 of [...] they were not emptied; rain and / [...] their existent days. /

The apostle s[peaks] to t[hat] elect one: The measure / [of th]at river was expanded seven times, as they flow [10] [...] of the body of the [... / ...] waters [...] now. Marvel at / [...] as you say: Grea[t is] its [... / ...] indeed prolonged, for a bearer [... b]ut [...] / you marvel at this. Marvel first [...] [15] that [...] is the first [...] which came into being i[n] this / [...] is how great a struggle, since it has / [...] these creatures of destruction, the mighty giants. Beho/ld, they are entwined, bound, {}*89 and {}*90 in every place. / They are hidden, not revealed before the eyes of every flesh that [20] exists on the land of death [...] these rulers / [...] revealed. The entire universe of flesh will be destroyed / and dissolved [...] all pass away [... / ...] they will be destroyed with their angry voice, / which is mightier than the thunder. Now, as this small stream is reckoned [...] [25] before the vastness of these waters of which I have recounted to you. / For only one river from thousands of rivers of water, from the secrets / that are not revealed, is the river Tigris upon the eart[h]. /

See [...] and be amazed at the measure of the elements of the wa/ters. Marvel at the stature of the Man who bore t[30]hem. And understand how great is t[hat] god, / active in power, the one whom these waters [... t]/han the stature of the First Man who [assumed] (155) this garment of such size; and how much was made.

Then his / disciples say to him: We revere you, our master, and w[e] give / thanks that moreover you have opened our eyes to all [the g]re/atnesses that are hidden from every person. Yet, to us you have [5] manifested them!

/ Concerning the Three Rocks. /

Mani uses the term 'rock' to describe three modes of absolute stability established by the divine in the universe.

Once again he speaks to his disciples: Three great / rocks, which exist, were appointed by the greatness. They were set in [10] these outer w[or]lds.

So, the first rock is the / [Pillar] of Glory, the Perfect Man, which was summoned / [by the] glorious Ambassador. He set it in this zone / [... he] brought forth its base (?) from the earth to heaven. It bore up under the [en]tire uni/[verse], and became first of all the weight-carriers in [15] [it]s powers. In its firmness it has been set upright, and has made fast / every [t]hing above and below. /

[The] second great and glorious rock is the new earth of / light, which was set upon the earth of darkness. It has squashed / the fastenings of the five storehouses of death. It has established [20] firmness, with great firmness, over and beyond the earth of darkness. / It has flattened, crushed and fixed the root of death. /

[The] third rock is the great thought, which was summoned / from Jesus, the glorious one. He set it in the holy church. / The church gathered in upon it, and has lived in [25] [it]. It has stood firm, with a true fixity, for ever. /

[These] are the three great rocks, they that have come forth in great / confidence, in three great and honoured places. They were appointed / and distributed in three great places of these [self]same worlds. / They were made fast according to the will of the greatness.

/ Concerning Love. /

Mani reveals the divine nature of love, which is manifested in the world in the church. In contrast, hate is the nature of the darkness; but it too is present in this time of mixture.

[O]nce again he speaks [to] his disciples: What is love? / [...] each [...], calling it 'love'.

(156) [Lo]ve is the Father of Greatness, who dwells in his / glorious land. The entirety of the divine has been revealed / [there]in! These two are a single living body, the Father / [a]nd his love; because he has given himself for every thing, as he exists in his aeons. Indeed, due to this, they called the Fa/ther, the Lord of the totality, 'love'. For he gave the victory to / his aeons and his limbs.

Again, the beginning of / all the righteousness and the divine that dwells in / the holy church; they have also called it 'love'. As indeed the church is made strong therein! [These] two, / the Mind and the church, a single body is also their likeness; / because, again, the apostle too shall gi[ve] his [own] / self for his church. [And, again], due to th[is], / the church too calls him 'love'. [So] is it written: There is no love greater than this, for someone [to give himself] / to death for his friend*91. Likewise, too, the beginning of ri[ght]/eousness is made of love for the church, according both to body and to / spirit. While in the body, in the church here; so in the / spirit, in the heights above.

Once again he speaks: What, conversely, is hate? Hate / is the first death that welled up. It revealed the land / of darkness. This one called 'hate', because / it has ruined all its perdition's offspring; it sinned even against / a power foreign to it, and ruined it. Due to this they shall call it 'hated'; for it has caused destruction, both wounding in / flesh, and what is not its own.

Today again it causes wo[unding] / and destruction in all flesh. It kills them all with / diverse deaths; these that are displayed today in every/thing, in every type. Even the Cross of Light, the 30 living [so]ul, likewise too it ruins and kills them; / as it did at the start. Indeed, due to this have they called i[t] / 'hated', this one from the hated; the envy from / the envy; the devil from the devil; the b[a]/d that came about from the bad. (157)

(157,1 – 158,23)

/ [Concerning] Adam. /

Mani explains that since Adam was fashioned by the evil powers after the image of the divine Ambassador, he was preeminent over all other mixed creations in three ways: his image was more beautiful; his soul fitted the correct distribution of the elements, and thus he had superior intelligence; the powers of the entire universe were sealed in him, and thus mankind became the key to the direction of future history.

This final point leads Mani to explain that the creation of Adam was a deliberate act by the rulers, the focus of their plan to control everything, and to capture the kingdom of light. He summarises their evil purpose in seven further points.

Once again he speaks to his disciples, who listen to his / words: Three great things that are distinct were reveal/ed in Ad[am] the first human. Indeed, due to this, he was found 5 to be better and more outstanding than the conjoined powers that are in heaven / and on earth.

The first: / The image of the exalted one was placed upon him. The creators / and moulders of his body sealed him after the shining form / of the image that had been displayed to them above. 10 Indeed, due to this, the image of Adam was found to be surpassingly beautiful / beyond any conjoined power above and below. /

The second thing: Adam was shaped in his structure / throug[h the li]ght of the first-born of heaven and / [earth ...] the five sons. Indeed, due to this, his 15 struct[ure] was found to differ from the structure of even the other creations; / [sin]ce the form of all creations is different. As for Adam, / the formation of his soul fits over the / correct distribution of the elements. Therefore, he has / intelligence surpassing that of the other creations and [20] beasts.

The third are the teaching/s and counsels and the seal of all the powers above and / below. The creators, who set him in order, gathered them and se/aled them in him. (Adam) and his consort Eve became a dwelling and home / for the signs of the zodiac and the stars; and the months, the days and the ye[25]ars. For the seal of the entire universe is stamped upon / Adam. Indeed, due to this, heaven and earth moved because of him; / trouble and disorder arose on his account between they that are g/ood and they that are evil. So, the good induce him to life / because of their image and shape placed upon him; while the [30] [wi]cked were drawing him to death, so that they would have po/[w]er through him and they would conceive the kingdom, and through him humiliate / the entire universe.

Furthermore, understand that / [the ru]lers determined and formed Adam so that they would be masters t/[hrough him a]nd c[onceiv]e the kingdom because of seven things.

(158) The first: He became the enlightener in their creati[o]n; instead of the li/ght of the image of the Ambassador wh[o] had displayed himself to them / above. For they all desi[re]d / the likeness of the image of the Ambassador. Their heart [5] was drawn after it.

The second: So that they would scoop up / the light through him and restrain and obstruct it / from its ascent to the heights. /

The third: So that because of the image of the Ambassa/dor that is placed upon him the entirety of the divine [10] that is above and below would be humiliated; on account of the likeness of the splendour, of / the beauty of his superiority. For he is superior in his appearance t/o all creatures.

The fourth: [He] is a / seal-ring and a new impression, so [that] / all births who will be begotten might be brought forth after his s[eal].

[15] The fifth: That might be displayed through him all the skil[ls]

/ of the powers, they above and below, secret and / manifest; and that they might determine through him the totality, and / every thing be revealed in him. /

The sixth: That there would come to be a great protection for them 20 through the image of the exalted one that was placed upon him; for as the heavenly would / [...] even rulers; and no evil thing would be done to them on account of Adam. /

The seventh: That he might become chief and king and master over all creatures; / and they might conceive the kingdom through him.

25 Concerning the Sun. /

This chapter presents a series of teachings about the divine nature of the sun, and the life-giving qualities of its light, compared with the evils of darkness and the night. It may have been redacted from separate sources. D. McBride (1988) has argued that it evidences heliolatry native to Egyptian Manichaeism; but that would be difficult to prove without a parallel non-Coptic text.

158.26 – 161.30 Mani reveals the greatness of the sun, which so many people and the false sects have not understood. The Old Testament God, here termed Satan, has attempted to obstruct the worship of the light in his law. Mani outlines seven benefits of the sun, contrasted with seven evils of the night.

161.31 -- 162.20 Five archetypes or qualities presented by the sun.

162.21 – 163.8 Three further qualities that correspond to the mystery of the Father.

163.9 – 164.8 Mani's concluding comments and admonitions to his disciples. He quotes a saying of Jesus from the Gospel of Thomas.

Once again, the apostle is sitting down among the congreg/ation of his disciples, one time, and the sun shone forth. He beg/an to recount to his disciples about the greatness of the su[n] / and its divinity. How was it fashioned after the [li]ke30ness of the first greatness? He was revealing to them.

He [say]/s, it is the gate of life and the vessel of [p]/eace, to this great aeon of l[ight ...] (159) However, since Satan knows that it is the gate of the / souls' departure, he placed an exclusionary judgement / in his law that no one worship it, saying: / Whoever will worship it can die*92. He has otherwise called it: 5 The light that will be nullified. He has hindered the souls from / themselves turning their faces towards the light. He has caused them to deny / the light of their being.

Now, people are blind abou/t everything! They have not understood the greatness of this great light-giver. / They have denied the grace of this great light that shines upon them. 10 They have not perceived its greatness and its divinity. / No[r], also, have they understood the good things that it does for them, / even today, as they are entrenched in their body; when it / comes to th[is] world and shines. Behold: How many are the ch/arit[ies] that it does for mankind! Yet they, for their part, de15ny its graces, which they know not. Every day, wo/uld this great light-giver shine its light, it shall do seven / good things for them. Shall they not see them? /

[The] first good thing that it does for them is its light, which it / shines upon them. It opens the eyes of all mankind. 20 They see underfoot as they walk by it. It takes away / the blindness of the night, which made them blind with its darkness. /

[The] second: When (the sun) is come to the world, with its coming / it shall bring calm and peace to the entire world. With its / coming it shall also take away from them all the fear and t25rembling, which their heart is filled with the whole night; for it shall / ta[ke] away the darkness present by its light, and sweep it out. / Also, this is how it extinguishes fear by its calm. /

The third is its vigil; because when (the sun) comes to the wo/rld all sleeping mankind shall arise 30 and awake. And the watchmen too shall cease from / watching. The guards who sit at the gates of camps, they / [bre]ak vigil at the watchposts, because of its light that has shone / [upon them in the w]orld.

(160) The fourth: It shall nourish, and give strength, taste and scent; / to the trees and fruits and vegetables, and all the herbs, / and the flowers and grasses, which are upon the entire earth. /

The fifth: When (the sun) shines in all the world, [5] the evil reptile and the sharp-toothed beasts that are filled of / wickedness, they shall flee to hiding in their dens. /

The sixth: When it shines its light, the wou/nd of any person is eased from pain. Its light shall me/lt away the evil arts of every doer of wickedness.

[10] The seventh: (The sun) shall display and manifest to the wo/rld the sign of the splendour of the aeons of ligh[t], from which it has / come out; it here in this world being their sign. It / brings light to the whole of creation.

Behold: How gre[at i]s the fo/olishness that has befallen the sects of error! [15] Not only that they have not perceived the mystery of [the div]/inity of this great light-giver; but also, even all the benefits / that it does for them. They forget them. They do not perceive t/hem.

Now, just as I have shown you the sun, / which does seven good things in the world, hear al[20]so what I teach you about the night, for it has all wickednes/ses therein. Every occasion, would the night fall, it sha/ll do seven evils in the world. /

The first wickedness that the night shall do in the world / is the darkness, with which it shall fill the entire world; beca[25]use when the sun sinks from the world and dra/ws to it its rays, at that instant the shadow / of the night shall spread out over the whole world. The eye[s] / of the people fill with blackness. They neither see nor wonder / with their eyes, because of the darkness of the night which shall fill the whole wor[30]ld.

The second evil thing that / the night shall do is its fear; because when its / shadow looms forth, its fear and its trembling shall possess all of mankind. The entire world shall fil[l] / of the night.

The third: W[hen the night] (161) falls, all creatures take up revolt. / They rebel in their heart, to do wickedness and perdition. /

The fourth: The heaviness of sleep shall lay upon them, and they / fall asleep; they slumber and doze, and they are like [5] these corpses in the night.

The fifth is its / ugliness; again, when the night would fall, the form / of the people shall be hidden in the darkness and the ugliness of the night. / The beauty and the form of men and women shall not be displ/ayed before one another, because of its darkness and its ugliness; [10] which it shall spread out over all their forms. /

[The] sixth occasion is when the night would fall on / the world. At that instant evil people shall come / out to do wickedness; the adulterers, and the robbers and pois/one[r]s. The evil beasts shall come out, and all the reptiles [15] that are filled with wickedness, from their dens. And they sta/lk in the night. Also, the demons and fiends find power / to do wickedness in the night. Again, the blows and buffets and / wounds and discharges shall torment people in / the night; because in it the whole of evil shall find strength.

[20] The seventh: The night shall display the sign / of the darkness, its father. It has arisen out of its essence; / because this night that came out of this first darkness has / been displayed in the world. Note this night, the shadow / of this first darkness, the one that is entwined and bound in all things [25] above and below.

Behold, I have tau/ght you about these seven wickednesses of the black night; / the ones that it shall do daily in the world, in the ni/ght. The sects have not seen this black night: / what it is; nor from whence is its essence. That all these evils [30] find strength in it! /

[On]ce again he ramified. He says to his disciples: / [There are] five archetypes occur in the sun, it making them / [...] as it finds the world.

(162) The first is its light; for it illumines by its light / the world, and all the creatures who exist in it. /

The second is its beauty; because when it shines, it shall / flood beauty and loveliness upon all creatures [5] and everything. /

The third is its peace; for, again, when the sun would / shine on the world, all people shall receive affect/ion through it, and give peace to one another. /

The fourth is the life of the living soul, which it shall release from all the bonds and fetters of heaven and earth. /

The fifth: It gives a strength to the elements; and also it gives a / scent and a taste to the entire Cross of the Light.

So, / you yourselves see that its light illumines / more than all lights that occur in the world. Also, its beauty [i]s more beautiful than all the beauties of mankind. Again, its pea/ce is more surpassing than all the powers and guards who ex/ist in the world. Its releasing action, by which it releases / the living soul, is a full day ahead of / all releasing actions! The strength that it gives to its li[20]mbs is a great strength, being mightier than all strengths! /

Once again, there are another three archetypes made apparent by the sun, in res/pect of the mystery of the first greatness. /

The first is the filling up of the disk of its ship; because / its ship has filled up every season, and shall not wane at all, the way that the ship of the moon wanes. This continuous filli[ng], / by which it is filled, displays the my/stery of the Father, the great greatness; from whom all the powers / and the gods have come forth. He shall never wane, / nor shall lack ever exist in him!

[30] The second: (The sun's) light surpasses the light of / all the stars, and all the lights that occur in the [universe]; / corresponding to the mystery of the light of the Father; for his l[ight sur]/passes and is greater than the light of his a[eons].

(163) The third: This sun is very high above / all else. It surpasses the height of all the mountains and / hills that exist upon the entire earth, corresponding to the mystery of / the Father of Greatness; for he is high above all the household of his light-earth. Also, because the Father himself / is high above all the heights and the mountains of his / light-earth. He is 'filled up' in his image [all] the time / and every hour from eternity to eternity! /

[Beho]ld the two mysteries I have taught you, O my b[e]lov[10]ed ones! The mystery of the night and that of the day, which daily come / forth in the world. Now, the mystery of the li/[g]ht and the mystery of the darkness are displayed dai/[ly] in the created order. The sects have not seen them in their / [error]! The mystery of the first great light is [15] [the] sun, which is this second light-giver, the one that comes dai/ly to the world. It displays all [the] marks o/f its graces, displaying and signifying on its own behalf / that it is good, out of the essence of the good. / It came from the good Father and appeared in [20] this world.

In contrast, this night that is made of fe/ar exists after the mystery of the darkness. Behold too the myster/y of its essence! It displays it in the wo/rld in all these wickednesses. It displays this my/stery daily in the world, but the sects kno[25][w] it not in their error. They do not distinguish the my/[st]ery of the light from that of the darkness. Indeed, concerning this myste/[r]y that is hidden from the sects, the saviour cast an allusion / [to] his disciples: Understand what is before / [y]our face, and then what is hidden from you will be unveiled to you*93.

[30] [Once] again the apostle speaks: You are the children of the d/[ay and] the children of the light. However, you <[...] the character of the darkness> are the children / [of the night a]nd the children of the darkness.

(164) Yet, blessed are you, my beloved ones! Blessed are your / souls, for you have known the mystery of the day and / that of the night. You have understood, that the day exists after the myste/ry of the light, but the night after the mystery of the dark[5]ness. They have not arisen from one another. Blessed is he / who can know this mystery and distinguish these two esse/nces, that of the light and that of the darkness, the ones that have not arisen / from one another; so that he can inherit life eternal!

The solar theme is continued from the previous chapter to this one, entitled after the Ambassador as the principal god who dwells in the sun. Mani compares sunrise and sunset to the first and last moments of the history: when the First Man came and shone over the darkness; and when the Last Statue will ascend, leaving behind him eternal death. The entire 'second time' of the cosmos and of mixture is thus the daytime for the creatures of flesh and darkness, between eternal nights both before and afterwards. Mani uses this lesson to exhort his disciples to preach the truth, whilst there is still time for repentance.

Once again he speaks to his disciples: Pay attention, look / [and] understand in the way that I show you. / Two great mysteries are apparent in this shining sun, / at its rising and setting. Now, at the moment / when it rises and is visible in the universe, all creatures of flesh shall lift up their heads fr[om their sleep] / towards the splendour of the sun, <and open their doors*94>. While at evening / time, when the sun sinks from the universe, / all people from every place and even all beasts / shall go in to their dark hiding places. The popula tion of the entire universe shuts their doors*95 and dark night / overcomes them. They go inside and stay within the dark nig/ht in their hiding places. /

Very great is this mystery revealed by the sun! / For when the sun rises and [be]come[s] visible at the beg inning of the day all people open their doors, and / all of humanity and every creature emerges onto the ear[th] / to destroy this Light Cross that is established i[n] / silence.

This pertains to the mystery of the First / Man, because when he came out from the grea[t] ness he shone forth over all the children of darkness. At that mome[nt] / all the children of darkness came forth from their stor[e]/houses, its powers and its armies, abandoni[ng] their cav[es] / and their black abyss. They destroyed the [outer] body / of his five sons, who were swathed over hi[s b]o[dy, in (165) t]hat first struggle.

*94 Or 'mouths'.
*95 Or 'is silent'.

Again, when / the sun sinks from the universe and sets, / and all people go in to their hiding places and / houses and conceal themselves; this also pertains to the mystery / of the end, as it presages the consummation of the universe. For, / when all the light will be purified and redeemed i[n] / the universe at the last, the collector of all things, / the Last Statue, will gather in and sculpt it/self. It is the last hour of the day, the time / when the Last Statue will go up to the aeo[n of] / light. The enemy too, death, will go in to / bondage; to the prison of the souls of the de[ni]iers / and blasphemers who loved the darkness. They will go in / with it to bondage and the dark night overcomes th[em]; / and thenceforth this name 'light' will not shine upon them.

Behold / the two mysteries made visible daily in the sun, / which is this splendrous light-giver. /

Now, [b]ecause of this I say to you, my brothers and loved ones: / Take trouble and train yourselves, and preach to the so/uls that they might seize the moment, while alive, for their / repentance. As long as there is time to do the good, / before the door is shut and the souls are kept back, stopped / at the gate of life; and they become part of the treasure of the enemy. /

[Wh]en his disciples heard this, they were frightened and alarmed and disturbed <[saying: We ...] in great agitation [...] for we would be saved from death [to dwell in the] imperishable [aeon] for ever>.

/ Concerning the Light-Giver. /

This chapter is again based upon an analogy about the sun. This time Mani plays on the title 'enlightener', used both of the sun and of himself. The believers are compared to the sun's rays extending across the entire earth; and Mani promises to draw them all after him to the eternal kingdom of light.

Once again he speaks to his disciples, while he sits / in the midst of the congregation: Note how the sun, the great / light-giver, comes with its splendour when it 30 shines over the universe, and its rays shall extend over / the entire earth. Again, when it is about to set, its ra/ys shall [disappea]r and sink. It does not leave [behind] a single ray / [on the earth].

Again, this is also what I am like! (166) In the image of flesh, wherein I have been set, I have been displ/ayed in the universe. Also, all my children, / the righteous elect who are mine in every / country, are like the sun's rays. At the moment, when I will 5 come forth from the universe and go to the household of my people, / I will gather toge[ther] all the elect who have believed in me / to that place. I will draw them to me, each one of them at / the time of his coming forth; I will not leave any one of them / in the darkness.

Now, because of this I say to you: 10 Every one of you who loves me, let him love all my children, the / blessed elect, for I am with them. I / alone. How so? For my wisdom anoints th[em] / all. The great glorious one lives in all of them, and every / one who will love them and mix with them in his charity 15 may live and be victorious with them; and be saved from the black / universe.

/ Concerning Fire. /

Fire is one of the five light elements. Nevertheless, this brief chapter also evidences Mani's delight in classifying all aspects of the world, to establish a totally integrated system.

Once more he speaks: This fire, which burns and is apparent to-20day in the world, it does five works. /

The first work that it does is this: It incinerates / and burns wood, and everything that shall be placed upon it. /

The second: It separates four aspects of the wood, which / are these: fire and light, ash and sm[25]oke.

The third: It gives a taste and an {aroma}*[96] to / whatever will be cooked on it. It also gives heat and ch/eer to whoever will be close to it.

The fourth work that [it] / does: All craftsmen shall work the / utensils that they will fabricate in it.

The fifth: [30] It sh[all] display light, and the people see by [it].

(166,31 – 169,22)

/ Concerning the Twelve Signs of the Zodi/ac and the Five Stars. /

Mani is asked to explain the distribution of the twelve signs of the zodiac and the planetary stars. Since he subscribes to the astral fatalism found throughout gnostic and esoteric systems in late antiquity, he identifies them as evil rulers from the worlds of darkness. However, it is noticeable that this causes a variety of structural problems for his system, all of which are apparent in this chapter.

In Manichaeism the demiurge is one of the light gods, the Living Spirit, unlike the case with many of the other dualistic traditions. Thus, it is constantly necessary to explain why evil powers are given a place and a role in the universe.

The characteristic pentads of Mani's system, here the five worlds of darkness from which the evil powers originate, can not be made to fit the distribution of the twelve zodiacal signs.

Perhaps of most interest, Mani is clearly aware that the ruling powers are commonly understood to be the seven and the twelve (as in Mandaeism). However, since for him the sun and moon are divine vessels, he must develop his teaching about the two ascendants (the two lunar nodes when the moon crosses the ecliptic of the sun). In this chapter there are two obvious attempts to reconcile this matter.

Once more, during one of the times, the apostle [is sitting down] (167) among the congregation. A disciple stood before him and question/ed him. He says to him: We entreat you, our master, that you may recount / to us and explain about the twelve signs of the zodiac / that are set in the sphere. How are they determined?

Or to what place do they belong, [5] according to their essence? Or else again, these five stars that circle / in them, from whence are they? Or why has the demiurge appointed them / as the authorities and leaders? He is the great construc/tor who has appointed the entire creation; and he has bound and fix/ed them on the sphere. Now, we entreat you, our [10] master, that you may satisfy us about these things that are hidden from all mankind. /

[Th]en he speaks to that disciple who had questioned him: Whether / these twelve signs of the zodiac that are fixed on the sphere, or these fi/ve stars that circle upon them; those and these are rulers, all of them, / according to their essence. They are all enemies and rivals to [15] each other <one oppresses another, they threaten each other>. They plunder one another by the action of the great / craftsman who has formed all the worlds. He has gathered / [them] and bound them on the sphere above, which circles const/antly. Now, while it circles and tumbles them, so they shall do every/thing that they desire, above and below, according to their plea[20]sure. Nevertheless, a guardian is over them, a debt-collector a/bove them; compelling, extorting, and taking what is theirs / away from them!

Now, this is how it can rightly be understood. They were / [s]eized from the five worlds of darkness, and bound on the s/[ph]ere. Two zodiacal signs were taken per world. Gemini [25] [an]d Sagittarius belong to the world of smoke, which / is the mind. In contrast, Aries and Leo belong to the wo/rld of fire. Taurus, Aquarius and Libra be/[long] to the world of wind. Cancer and Virgo / [an]d [P]isces belong to the world of water. Capricorn [30] [an]d Scorpio belong to the world of darkness. These are / [the] twelve rulers of depravity, the ones that wicked/[ness] shall not [...] For they cause all the evil and / [... in the wo]rld, whether in tree or in flesh.

(168) And understand also about these five stars, the leaders: from where were they / formed? The star of Zeus (Jupiter) was generated from / the world of smoke, which is the mind. In contrast, Aphro/dite (Venus) came about from the world of fire. [5] And then Ares (Mars) belongs to the world of wind. Hermes (Mercury) / belongs to the world of water. Cronos (Saturn) belongs to the world / [of] darkness.

And also, the two ascendants are counted to / fire and desire, the dry and the / moist. They are the father and the mother of all these.

An[d al]so, the sun and the moon, which are counted in with them as a / rule <[counte]d to their kind, but why did they count them in with them?> so that they would reign over them. You will discover they subjugate them at / every moment.

These seven we have named, the five stars and the / two ascendants: They are the doers of wickedness that do every wi/cked and bad act in every land, the whole of it, abo[15]ve and below, in every creature, in the dry / and the moist, in tree and flesh.

Once more I reveal to you about these signs of the zodiac: [They] are / distributed, appointed on four sides, three per angle in / these four places. And they are fixed to this revolving sphere. Ari[es], [20] Leo and Sagittarius, they three belong to a single side*[97]. / In contrast, Taurus, Capricorn and Virg[o], / these other three belong to another side. And then, Gemini, / Libra and Aquarius belong to another side. Scorp[i]/o, Pisces and Cancer belong to another corner. Now, th[ey] [25] are placed like this, appointed to these four parts, and distribute[d] / on the sphere.

So, when the side of A[ri]/es, Leo and Sagittarius will be plundered by the guard/ian who is over it, who extorts from it and the leaders [w]/ho move upon it; at that instant shall affliction st[r][30]ike all the four-footed creatures below. / However, when [the side] of Tau[rus], / Virgo and Capricorn will be plundered; [affliction] sh[all] (169) at once befall the herbs, together with the vegetables and / all the fruits of the trees. Yet again, when / the side of Scorpio, Pisces and Cancer will be plundered; / scarcity shall befall the waters upon the earth, [5] and drought be from place to place. / Conversely, should the side of Gemini, Libra and Aq/uarius be plundered; deformity and stuntedness shall befall / the form of mankind from place to place. /

Behold now, I have explained to you about these tw[el]ve [10] signs

*[97] The circle of the zodiac is quartered, with each set of three houses grouped as by an equilateral triangle. Thus Aries, Leo and Sagittarius are not consecutive signs; but rather the first, fifth, and ninth houses.

of the zodiac: They were fashioned from the five / worlds of darkness, and bound on the sphere.

Also, I have taught / you about the other five, the stars: They too came about / from the five worlds of the land of darkness.

I have recounted / to you also about the [t]wo ascendants: They are se[15]t to the mystery of fire and desire. They / are the dry and the moist, the father and the mother. /

Again, I have revealed to you about the sun and the moon: They / are strangers to them. Still, because of the constraint of the arrangeme/nt, in that the thing receives light, and as they belong and plunder them; [20] because of this they were counted in with them in relation to the calculation of / the number. For, the sun and the moon are from out of the greatness, / not belonging to the stars and the signs of the zodiac.

/ Concerning the Body: It was [25] constructed after the Pattern of the Uni/verse. /

Astrology connects this chapter to the last. However, the basic theme here is the correspondence between the micro- and macro-cosmos. The chapter appears to be redacted from a number of separate sources or Manichaean lessons.

170.1 – 20 The structure of the human body and its organs accords to that of the universe.

170.21 – 172.29 The events that occur in the watch-districts of the five sons of the Living Spirit, the conflicts between evil powers and the gods, correlate to those within the individual as the new man struggles with the old. Compare 92.9 – 94.16.

172.29 – 173.20 Demonic rulers exist in the organs of the four worlds of the human body.

173.21 – 174.10 The zodiacal signs correspond to parts of the body vertically from the head to the feet.

174.10 – 175.4 In a second schema the signs are arranged in a circle from the right temple of the head round to the genitals, and returning up the left side of the body.

175.5 – 24 Thousands of evil rulers exist in the human body. They cause illness within, or suppurations on the surface.

[Aga]in, on one of the occasions, the apostle is sitting do/[w]n among the church in the midst of the congregation. He says to his / disciples: This whole universe, above and 30 below, [re]flects the pattern of the hum[an] body; / [as the f]ormation of this body of flesh ac(170)cords to the pattern of the universe.

Its head is like / the first-fruits of the five garments. And, from its neck / down to the site of its heart, it resembles the pattern / of the ten firmaments. And again, the heart accords to 5 the wheel of the rotating sphere. And, from its heart / down to its intestines (?), is like this atmosphere / that extends from the sphere down to the earth. The [male] part / of the body corresponds to this great earth. And also, from its / intestines (?) down to its loins is 10 like the three earths. And also, its shinbones to the pa/ttern of the space in which the Porter stands. / Its footsoles to the great earth upon which the Po/rter is stood; and the four fastenings that are under his / feet. Its liver to the vessel of fire. 15 Its flesh to the vessel of darkness. Its b/lood to the vessel of water.

Now, this is how / the small body corresponds to the macro- / cosmos in its firmaments, in its orderings, in its / mountains, its walls and its vessels. As I have 20 made clear to you!

Once more, I reveal to you: / There exist five great camps in this / great outer zone, of which the five sons of the Living / Spirit are masters.

So, in the first watch-station / above, of which the Keeper of Splendour is master, 25 on the battlement of all the works, is found his authority / over the three heavens. Then the ones below him [... / ...] the great King of Honour. /

The second watch, of which the great King of Honour / is master, his own authority (extends) over the seven 30 firmaments beneath him.

The thi[rd] / watch, of which the Adamant [is master, his authority] (171) rei[g]ns from the firmament down below to the [earth]. / [And he] invigorates, according to his authority, the sphere and the [wo]/rlds of the atmosphere; and the other four worlds that are appointed on / this earth.

The fourth watch, over which the King of [5] Glory has power, is the three wheels. And his / [auth]ority lies over the three earths upon the hea[d] / of the Porter.

The fifth watch is the wat/ch over which the Porter is authoritative. Again, he is / master, according to his authority, over this great earth [10] he stands upon, and the four fastenings under / his feet.

Affliction has come about in these five watches from ti/me to time.

So, in the watch of the Keeper of Splendour, / s[in] desired to spurt up towards the image / of the Ambassador. Yet, they barred it from that place, [15] and it fell back down in shame. /

Again, an earthquake and treachery occured in the watch of the great / King of Honour, which the watchers who had arisen / at the time and had [...] they who were sent came down, / until they were humbled.

Also, in the watch [20] of the Adamant, the abortions came to the earth and fashioned [the] / figure of flesh.

Again, in the watch of the King of Glory, / a commotion happened in these three earths abo/ve the Porter. The pathway was obstructed for / [the] ascent of these three wheels; that of wind, that of [25] water, and that of fire.

Also, in the watch of the Po/[r]ter, the fastenings beneath were laid bare and strained their / [ch]ains. A great [ear]thquake befell that place. /

[Like] these five watch-[stations], which exist in this great / [... these fi]ve camps, which I have recounted (172) [to] you. This is also the case with this body that the e[l/e]ct wear. There are another five camp[s] / there, and the Light Mind is watching over them, and the new / man who is with him.

The elect person who will con[5]trol and subdue the configuration of his face, which is above his bo/dy, and guide it towards the good; he resembles / the mystery of the Keeper of Splendour, who rules o/ver the watch above the zone.

Whoever will become master / [over] his heart and subdue it; he is the sign of the great [10] King of Honour, who subdues the seven heavens.

Wh/oever will become master to his genitals and subdue his lust; he is / the mystery of the Adamant of Light, the one who / subdues Matter.

Whoever will subdue the stomach and / become master to the fire that is in him, and also purify [15] the nourishment that comes in to him; he resembles the likeness / of the King of Glory, the one who turns the wheels, sending / the life above.

Whoever will become master over the ruling-po/wer that is beneath in his feet, and bind it with the / chain of peace; he is like the Porter, the one who subdu[20]es with his footsoles the abysses below.

Also, the teaching / of wisdom, which circulates in that body: to / the likeness of the Virgin of Light, who goes up and / comes down in this zone, above and be/low.

Also, love and joy, faith [25] and truth, in which the person should l[iv]e: they are / to the likeness of these two light ships. For, the living s[o]/ul should go up in them and become free through them; / and it ascends from the abysses below and arrives at [the] / heights above.

Once more, understand this other (truth): [30] There exist four worlds i[n th]is body of the f[lesh], / and there exist countless times seven rulers [in the b]ody [of the four] / worlds!

So, the first w[orld is from its] (173) neck up; and also the seven rulers who are / in this upper world are these: the two organs of sigh[t], / and the two of hearing, and the two of smell. / The other one is the mouth, which is the organ of taste.

[5] [The] second world is from its neck down to / its entire upper torso. And also, the seven rulers w[ho] / are in this second world are: its [two] arms / that accord to the pattern of its two ears, which [oc]/cur in its first world above; and i[t]s [10] two breasts that are to the pattern of its organs of smell; / and the two eyes of its heart; and the gullet of the stoma/ch between the two breasts, which in the che/st is the pattern of the mouth.

Once more, there exist seven / rulers in the third world of the body, [15] which are these: the fat, the lung, the sple[en], the liv[e]r, the gall, / and its two kidneys.

Also, the fourt[h wo]rld b/elow. There are another seven there of this same kind: its / two buttocks (?), and its two testicles, and its two loins; / and the member out of which the seed comes, that begets [20] all the forms. /

[O]nce more the enlightener speaks to his hearers: Ari/es and Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, / Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Ca/pricorn, Aquarius and Pisces; these are the twe[25]lve signs of the zodiac that occur in the worlds above, on / the sphere. They are interlocked and bound on this turning wheel, the one in whi/ch they are [...], fixed, and planted. And, regarding [a]ll these twelve / signs of the zodiac, this is how they were appointed and made leaders / [...] on the sphere beneath the heaven that is the wheel of the [30] [stars]. Now, they are appointed like this, they are thus, so that you can find the head of / [...] and you find the tail too [... / ...]

Again, they occur like this, (174) these that we have recited, one after another in this body. They are counted / by order and number from the head to the / feet. Its head is Aries. Its neck and its shoul/ders are Taurus. Its two arms Gemini. [5] Its upper torso is Cancer. Its stomach is / Leo. Its belly is Virgo. The v[er]tical spine / and its intestines (?) are Libra. Its genitals / [S]corpio. Its loins are Sagittarius. Its knees ar[e / Capri]corn. Its shinbones are Aquarius. [10] The soles of its feet are Pisces.

Behold, these / are also distributed one after another. They exist in this body, / as if turned to the side and bent to the pattern of the twelve signs of the zodiac. / They too are thus, arranged one against another, head / to tail, a[s] they occur on the wheel [15] [...] up.

Also, they are counted by / order and number of the body and all its members. / So, we have proclaimed that these are turned to the side, bent, and spread / out; because from its head down to its / hip shall count six to its left, and another six to its right. [20] The six that are down its right are these that I / will recount: the right temple is Aries; its right shoul/der is Taurus; its right arm is / Gemini; its right rib-cage is Cancer; / its stomach is Leo; the right side of its reproductive organs [25] are Virgo. Conversely, the other s[ix] about which we have spoken, / which are to its left, in contrast they come / from its hip to its head: its left [...] / is Libra; its left rib-cage is Scorpi[o]; / its left breast and left kidney [is Sag][30]ittarius; its [left] elbow is Capricorn; its left shoulder is Aquariu[s]; / its left temple is Pisces. This is how / the creator of the body himself has appointed them. He has [set] / them in order and arranged them, one against its companion, head to [tail].

[5] Once more he speaks: Listen to this other lesson that I will pr[ocla]/im to you. Understand that there exist many powers / in this body. They are the house-dwellers who are made the leade[rs] / in it. There are eight hundred and forty times ten thousand [ru]/lers made chiefs in the human b[o]dy! They are distributed and [10] set firm, quartered according to house. The count and / number of their houses is two hundred and ten times ten thousand. /

When all these rulers come creeping and [m]ov/[ing with]in the body, they will meet one another; and they shall / beset and destroy one another, and [...] [15] in them there. When [... t/il]l they shall erupt from the body of the person who [will] / die; and make putrid boils and sores and [bur]ning wounds / in the body. Either they might have made hi[m] sick with[in]; / or else they might come forth upon his outer side. Those woun[20]ds shall first be squeezed and discharge their liquid, / and empty out their pus, until they are squeezed [... / ...] and the suppuration forced out from the wound. Afterwards, / their scars [shal]l close over; and they are healed and obtain relief f/rom the places that came out upon them.

/ Concerning the Gathering in / of the [E]lements. /

This chapter discusses the sequence by which the light elements will be gathered in and ascend up to the eternal kingdom at the end of time, the destruction of the universe. This corresponds to the eschatological path taken by each soul: to answer the summons of salvation, to become one with the Light Mind, to ascend up the Pillar to the moon (the First Man), then to the sun (the Ambassador), and thus to the aeons.

[O]nc]e more the enlightener speaks: In what way shall / [the] elements be gathered in, from one to another?

The l[30][igh]t shall be gathered in [to] the fire, and the fire itself gathered / [in to the water, and the wa]ter gathered in to the wind, and the (176) [win]d gathered to the air, and the air gathered to the answer, / [an]d the answer gathered to the summons. Also, the summons / [to the] purified Mind, which is the intellectual. The intellectual to / [the P]illar of Glory, [the P]illar of Glory to the First [5] [M]an, the Man to the Ambassador, the Ambassador / [to] the aeons of greatness.

They are gathered in like this; / but, [they] will be gathered on one occasion only, and go up a/[b]ove to the place of rest for ever and ever.

[10] Concerning the worn / and torn apart Garments, or the tattered Clothes, / or the Elements, the C/ross, and the rest too. /

The divine light soul (or elements) that descended at the beginning of the history with the First Man was devoured by the evil demonic forces of matter. During the course of the history it has experienced different forms of degradation, and of salvation, depending upon its position and role in the conflict. Since it was the armour (or the five sons) that the First Man had assumed at his descent, it frequently receives various names that are variants on the concept of a garment. In this chapter Mani explains the different terms and roles during the history; but emphasises that they will all return to a single form and a single name at the final victory.

Once more the apostle is sitting in the congregation of his 15 disciples. He says to [hi]s disciples: What is this lesson / [that] is written in [the scriptures]? It proclaims the name the 'great garm/ents', but what then are these 'great garments'? Or again, this / you sometimes call the 'rags', what are those / 'rags'? Or the 'worn and torn apart'? Or what are 20 the 'images and the tattered clothes'? Or what is this name: / 'light element'? Or conversely, what is the 'Cro/ss of Light'? Or why named otherwise: the 'couns/el of life'? Or what is the 'soul that is slain'; being killed, / oppressed, and murdered in the enemy? What are all these names? 25 Look, they are written and sealed, according to memory, / by a multitude of scriptures. Now then I ask you, / so that you may tell me: What are they? Or how have they changed / with all these names and become set in altered forms, / namely all these?

His disciples say to him: 30 You, our father, are the source [of] all wisdoms. [Th]/erefore, we entreat you that you may open o[ur e]/yes about all these things. Te[ach us these wisdoms], / since you are the fount of [all wisdoms]!

(177) Then speaks the apostle to them: It is proper for [yo/u] to understand this. The garments that are named / 'great garment' are the five intellectuals that [make per]/fect the body of the Pillar of Glory, the Perfect Man. 5 They were purified by the coming of the Ambassador. /

In contrast, the ones named 'rag': the rags are the devoured enlightening power. / It is compounded and entangled in [the bo]/dy of the universe in the rulers who are above, who / exist in all the firmaments. Also, its shine is t10hat which lights up and is displayed in the stars of the chain and the powers / [of the] course. And likewise, these rags that are entangled in / these [thre]e [ear]ths below, above the head of the Port/[er ...] on the earth that is under the Porter. These are / [named] the 'rags', because [...] set [... 15 ...]

However, the 'great worn and torn apart garments', / which we have proclaimed, is this entangled living power. / It is reaped, cut, and devoured. / It is overpowered by the five worlds of the flesh, wh/ich creep as they move from place to place.

20 On the other hand, [these] we have termed the 'images and the great / tattered clothes' [...] are the three great garments / of the wind, the fire, and the water. These the Living Spirit / cloaked upon his body. With them he set in order thing/s in the universe. With them also he emptied the vess25els. He swept them out and laid them bare in front of the Por/[t]er at the foundation of all things. /

Conversely, '[the ele]ments', we have called them this name, are this / [pow]er that remains in all things below. It rises up / [in] the wombs of all the earths, gathering together, and pouring 30 f[ort]h upon [a]ll thin[gs].

And then, the '[Light] Cross' / [we have termed] this bound 'light power'. It / [...] all [...] upon the earth, in (178) the dry and the moist.

Also, the one name[d] / the 'counsel of life' is the summons and the / [obed]ience. It moves in all these powers that we have named. / It awakens them, gives them ease, and drives them 5 to their movement.

The one named 'the soul [that is s/l]ain', which is killed, oppressed and murdered; it is / this power of fruit, vegetables and seeds. They shall be th/[r]eshed, plucked and cut down; and they / give nourishment to the worlds of the flesh. Further: the wood should it be dr10y, and the garment should it become ragged, will perish. Again, it is [a pa/]rt of this entire soul that is slain and killed; s/ince also even this whole part of it they kill / [...]

For all these names [... / ...] are a single [...] since the beginning, it [...] 15 as it enlightens; but they separated into all these parts / in this first contest. They became set in all these altered / forms, and these many names. Of course, / if now all these var[iet]ies are laid bare, and stripped / of all these appearances, [and] parted from all 20 these names; they will gather together [and] make a single form, / and a single name, unaltered and unchangeable for ever in the / land of their first essence, from which they were sent forth / against the enemy.

[25]Concerning the Envy of Matter. /

178.26 – 179.16 Mani begins by outlining four crucial moments in the history when Matter (hyle), the driving force of the darkness, has displayed the envy that is the essence of its nature. It envied: the First Man; the image of the Ambassador; Adam; Christ and the apostles.

179.16 – 28 Furthermore, it has caused envy for Mani himself, and his church. The apostle turns the discussion into a warning to his listeners that sin will never be content to leave them secure in their faith.

179.28 – 180.19 Mani illustrates the point by recounting the typical actions of an envious person against the faithful, in every church since the beginning.

180.19 – 26 Final admonitions to be steadfast in the faith.

Once again the apostle speaks to his disciples: [The] / entirety of envy is this first nature that occu[red] / in the worlds of darkness.

In this envy that [...] / in it, the First Man [...] its poiso[n ...] [30] its evil-doing. His garment[s] were [...] / it cut them and drew them; [...]

(179) It envied the first image of the Ambassad[or], / which he displayed to it in the heights abov[e], / i[n] his form that it saw. It established the seal and the i[m]/age of flesh, and put the impression of t[h]at image [5] on flesh, its very own birth. /

[The th]ird time it envied Adam, the fir[st / hum]an. It seized a power from him, and bore it forth from a / [rib of] of Adam's [flesh].

The fourth time / [it en]vi[ed] all the firs[t-bo]rn and the first f[a[10]thers; an]d the blessed Christ who is the father of / all the [apostles]. Again, he too, it envied his / [endurance upon] the wood of the cross. It envied [the] fa/[thers of r]ighteousness. It was jealous of the [... / ...] all congregations of [... th]eir love over him, [15] [which] is among them, by the desire of its wickedness. It has [...] t/hem.

Furthermore, I myself was sent now, in this / last generation. It has envied me. For it wishes now, at the end, to be / god in its old land. After it had caused envy for me and / fulfilled its jealousy there, it also envied all my righteous[20]ness and my entire church and the whole assembly / [of] my catechumens. It could not bear to see a / single wise and true person, upright and stead/[fa]st in his deeds. Rather, it shall envy you with / [i]ts jealousy and wickedness; every one, whether [25] [a] great person or a disciple, a man o/r a woman, a male catechumen or a / female catechumen. They who are in truth, being perfect in / [the] faith. These of this kind sin shall not be content to [... /

...] cho[o]sing a single day. He was strong [30] [...] they are of it, but he has separ/[ated himself. He] spoke with them so that he might do (180) [a]mong them his will, whether outside or within. / While [in]side, he wounds them by his envy, with / [s]icknesses and pains and physical afflictions; and outside / with false reports and lying accusations [5] that he spreads as rumours after them. He makes [t/he]m hated and stinking among mankind, more and / [m]ore. He shall return to burst against the teacher and the righteous e[lec/t] person. He who preaches, manifestin[g / the] mystery in the revel[at]ion of [... [10] sa]ve by him his lamb[s ... / ...] in his hands. More and more it shall envy [... / ...] speaking after him with [...] words [...] / Now, these who are lesser in power, they [... / ...] negligent and confused i[n their] contorte[d] faith [...] [15] they fall from the faith. This is the desire [of Mat]/ter, the thought of death. This is the envy of its wi[cke]/dness, that it casts upon the entire kindred of life / from the very beginning until my time, from m/e too to my church.

Therefore, it is appropriate [20] for the wise person that he be steadfast and strong, / and stay with his truth and hope. And he not be / defeated nor cowed, nor give himself to the en[vy] / and hatred of dark Matter. Rather, he will stand firm [... / ...] in God and be strong and stay [with] [25] his hope and his [faith]; and he overcomes [...] / Whatever would cover me comes before him.

/ Concerning the living Fire: / It is present in Eight Places.

The living fire is one of the five light elements, and its origin is the eternal kingdom. However, the First Man also swathed it upon his body at his descent; and so it is present in this universe, from whence it is purified. It equates to the consideration amongst the five intellectual qualities.

30 Once again the apostle speaks: The [holy] living f[ire] / is present i[n] eight places. /

The first place wherein it is, is this [light] land [where it is present and] / exists. It is established beneath [it ... (181) ut]terly beyond the totality. It is the foundatio[n and / ba]sis of that great earth, and the consideratio[n / th]at is beneath them all.

The second pla[ce / whe]rein it is, is the Father, the God of truth; because 5 [the Fathe]r is established in his great, mighty consideration. / So, [firs]t in the Father. The other powers that came from him / were revealed through him, and (the fire) too came w[i]/th them [and was revea]led by them.

The third / [place wherein it is], is the First Man, h[e] wh[o ... 10 ...] armour. Again, it is this fire [... / ...] on the body of the Perfect Man. /

[The fourth is this fir]e that was purified from all the [light] powers, / [which is i]n the outer wall, in the ship of the day. /

[The fifth i]s this fire that is in the light-giver of the night 15 [...] within the water. /

[The] sixth is this f[i]re that is purified from the totality. The Living [Spirit] / swathed it upon his body, over the summons and / the obedience. He has established many things by it. He / went down and stripped himself of it before the Por20ter.

The seventh is this living fire that is of / the new earth, and is the consideration. For it is the first / foundation in the new earth, it they built anew [... / ...] the first course, that is a crown for the entire earth. T[hey] / are below the totality, over the entire earth of da[rkne]ss [25] [...] in it, in the [...] whole [...] /

[The] eigh[th] is the fire that shall be revealed in this [... / ...] person, and it signifies fear and war. Furthermore it / [...] it displays and manifests its sign in / [its ter]ror. It shall be r[ev]ealed in these two light ships.

[30] This i[s the way] that the holy living fire exists in these / [eight places].

/ [Concerning the Letter (?)] /

In this kephalaion the summons and the obedience are considered to be letters, a motif also found in the Hymn of the Pearl in the Acta Thomae. These two are the essence of redemption, the call to knowledge and the answer of knowledge, otherwise jointly termed the counsel of life. In Manichaeism the prototypical moment is the salvation of the First Man by the Living Spirit; and the call and answer are themselves divinised as, respectively, the sixth sons of each of these two great gods (92.1 – 4).

However, the point of this chapter is that the letters contain all knowledge of what has happened and what will happen; and thus it emphasises the divine foreknowledge and consequent control of events. As usual Mani connects the primordial event to the present, and makes it relevant to his audience. The Light Mind, which is the call to salvation within the church, is also an all-knowing letter. Similarly, the response of the people in their good works is also a letter; and so Mani can assure his listeners that everything they have done and need is known to Christ.

[O]nce again he speaks to h]is disciples, preaching the wo(182)[r]d of life. And thus he speaks to them about the su[mm/o]ns and the obedience: Consider the summons, which was sen[t f]/rom the Living Spirit in the beginning. He sent it [to the First] / Man. It is a peace letter and greet[ing] [5] that he wrote and sent to his brother, in which all the [tid]/ings are written down, together with everything it will / [bring ab]out and establish by [th]at summons. That / [summ]ons, the First Ma[n ... / is o]rdained to happen.

The an[swer that was sent from [10] the] First Man came to the heigh[ts, to the Living Spirit]. / That is also [a] letter, [which was sent from] / the First Man to the Living Spirit, [in which] all [the tidings] / are written down; and [every] w[ar] / and the struggles that he had waged. It did [...] [15] in the answer that the First Man [... / ...] everything that had happened and everything [that would happen], / all [t]hat had been done and whatever is made ready to be done by him. / The Living Spirit knew a[ll] the wars and the dang/ers and the contests that the rulers had waged against the First Ma[20]n.

The Light Mind also, which came from the beloved Chris/t and was sent to the holy church, is a / letter of peace too; in which all the reve[la]/tions and wisdom are written down [...] / all [...] in the light and everything that had happened [... [25] ...] it was prior to all mankind, and all that [...] / to happen at the last in it, as the holy church / shall understand all things.

This creation also [...] / this light product, that shall be generated from the holy church / and go to [...] is [a letter] [30] too; since all the [g]ood works tha[t the] holy ch/urch performs are written down in i[t. Every / thing] that it may entreat its father for, so that [... e]/ase in the world. And at the last [... r]/est before him. They are present in [... fa(183)s]ting and prayers and good works that [... / ...] them. It shall go up and be rev[eal]ed b/efore the blessed Christ. He shall answer it [... / ...] he [gives] power and makes it at ease [... [5] ...]

Indeed, [d]ue to this, I say to you: / [...] each [...] and entreaty, since a [... / ...] prayer. Everything that you will ask [for / ...] will be given you*[98], if [... / ...] perfect.

/ [Conce]rning Lord Manichaios: / how he journeyed. /

This important chapter has clear historical context and content. Mani is so busy answering the calls of King Shapur, (who does seem to have given him and his teaching some real protection), that a disciple wishes that there could be two Manis! The apostle replies that the world has scarcely been able to accept him alone. With authentic frankness he recounts the trials of his missionary journeys and the opposition of the authorities in various lands.

[F]urther, it] ha[pp]ened one time while our master Manichaios, / [our] light [enl]ightener, was staying in the [ci[15]ty] of Ktesiphon. Shapur, the king, enquired / after and summoned him. Our master stood / up and went to Shapur the king. Afterwards / [he] returned and came back to his congregation. When he had been a / [sh]ort while sitting down, before delay elapsed, King Sha[20][p]ur enquired af[te]r him another time. He sent, he called f/[o]r him. Again (Mani) returned, he retraced and went to King Shapur. / He spoke with him and proclaimed to him the word of Go/[d]. Again he retu[r]ned and came to the congregation. Also, a third / occasion, King Sh[ap]ur enquired after and called for him; [25] and [he] returned to him once more. /

[T]hen one of his disci[pl]es made a retort, Aurades by name, / [the] son of [Kap]elos. He says to our enlightener: Please, / our master [Manich]aios, give to us two Manis resembling you; / [pass]ing for you! Good, peaceful, and [30] compassionate [...] disciples in righteousness [like] you / [...] one Mani will remain with us as you; / [and the other go to] King [Sha]pur, his [mind] at ease, / [and proclaiming it] to him.

(184) W[h]en our enlightener heard these words from that [dis]/ciple, he shook his head. He says to him: Now be[ho/ld], I, a single Mani, came to the worl[d to / p]roclaim in it the word of [God]; and [do] [5] therein the good will that had been ent[rusted to me]. /

Then look, I, one Mani alone, have not been permitted [to] / speak

And, behold, the world bears down on me with [... / ...] upon me with its sects. They give me no place [to prea/ch] therein, and besides I am a single Mani. / I came to the world, and they have not given me time to pre/ach according to my will. They have not accepted me. I] / came [out] from the land of Pers[ia]. I went up / [to Me]sene, the city that [... / ...] in this truth that is in me, in [... I / proc]laimed this knowledge; I separated [the light from the darkness and] [10] d[iscriminat]ed life from death, what is go[od from] / what is evil, the righteous person from the sin[ner. I proc]/la[imed] the path of life and the command[ments ... / ...] Yet, when they had heard the voice [of truth and life], / the [rulin]g-power and the swarm of demons [... [15] ...] and the race of mankind [... / ...] under wickedness and hatred, they [... / ... they did not] allow me, [nor] did they / [permit me] to preach [the tr]uth in [tranquill]ity, the way that it / i[s]. See: In [...] [20] for they tolerate the kings, they acce[pt ...] and the / caesars and the satraps a[nd the governors who] are f[ound] / among them. Yet, the truth that I proc[laimed] among [them], / they did not accept it; and [... they did not listen] / to the voice of life that I cried out [among them].

[25] Again, [fr]om that place I came to the land of Babylon, the [ci]/ty of the Assyrians, and walked in [it]. I went in [to] / the [other] cities, and spoke in this truth [of the life that is with] me. I / proclaimed there the word of [truth and li]fe. / With [the voi]ce of the proclamation I se[parated the light from the dark][30]ness there, what is good from [what is evil ... / ...] the powers who are master [over ...] (187) their envy to the heart of the kings and the leaders / there. They and the sects of that place, they / [were s]et against me. Even as you yourselves see, they have w[aged] / some great wars [wit]h me. The lawle[ss] judges [5] [took] me, they watched. They and their rulers and the[ir / lea]ders took me in the midst of their land. If as / [...] to me the protection of the Father, who does [not] hel[p / the lawless]. Yet I, he helps me at [all] times / against his [enemy]. Still, they would not permit me in B[a[10]bylon] a single day to journey in their land. /

S[ee no]w: How great is the land of the Assyrians? / [It is abl]e to tolerate the kings and accept the eparchs / [and the gen]erals and the caesars and the governors / [... i]n it. It did not stir, nor was it [defe]ated before [them [15] ...] but, on the other hand, to me, it stirred and was disquieted [... / ...] It waged against me a multitude of struggles. [Therefore, I] le[ft be/hind me] the Assyrians.

I went to the land of the Medes and Par/thians. At that place I played the harp of wisdom; [I] / spoke in this living truth [th]at is with me. The [whole] land [20] [of] the Medes and the Parthians stirred, it shook [... / ...], to accept the hope of the life that I [proclaimed]. Yet see: How great / is the land of the Medes and the Parthians? Many / [ci]ties are found there. It was able to accept the kings / [an]d the leaders who were there; but, on the other hand, it was not able to acc[25][e]pt the power of my truth. It stirred, it all shook just as / [...]

Then the apostle speaks to that disciple: / Indeed I, a single Mani, came to the world. / All the cities [of the] world stirred, they shook. (The world) did not wi/[sh to] acce[pt m]e; unless I humbled its rebelliousness [30] [...] I have subdued its powers and brought / [...] all that were there. I have planted in it / [...] I have sown this [s]eed of life. I chose (188) a few from among the multitude [... / I], one Mani alone, came to the world; and [... / ...] all the powers of the world stirred. A turmoil ar[ose] / before me. And thus, if tw[o] Manis had [come] [5] to the world, what place would be able to tolerate them, or [what land] would / [be able] to accept them?

I, a singl[e] Mani, [d/id] come, and walking on tip-toes [... / ... no] pl[ace] was found for me wherein I could stand [fast ... / ...] on the fullness of my feet, [and walk on [10] the] earth like everyone, and do there [... / ... / ...] all of you, pray to God that he might [... / ... fe]et henceforth, this single Mani, who is [among you / on that d]ay, that [...] will happen [... [15] ...] he might do the will of the living ones [in the] / holy [ch]u[rch]. However, you, blessed are you i[f] / you make yourselves strong in this truth that I have given to you; so that you may be / [confirmed] in it, in the life which continues for ever and ever. /

Then, [whe]n that disciple had heard these things, he says to [20] the apostle: Blessed am I my master! [I], and all my other brothers / who hear these great things from you, we know that w[e] / all are among the living. And we are alive by your advent t[o] / us! We have found the truth more than all people who are in the wo/rld. Who of us will be able fully to repay you for the good[25]ness that you have done us, our father? Only the Father who se/nt you is sufficient fully to repay you for this / toil. For the recompense that you desire of him, the God who has / sent you, is this: every prayer you entreat of the Father, / may he grant you your prayer and your co[nsolation].

/ The Chapter of the Four K[ingdoms]. /

In this lesson Mani takes as his text a saying of Jesus, and develops his own teaching from an analysis of the terminology used by the saviour. To share not only with the righteous elect, but even with catechumens, is a deed beyond any achieved by the greatest kingdoms of this world. It will bring an eternal reward.

It is noteable that this kephalaion speaks of the indwelling Holy Spirit, rather than the to be expected Light Mind (and see 143.24 – 32).

Once again the apostle speaks: There are f[our great kingdoms] / in the world.

[The first is the kingdom (189) of] the land of Ba[by]lon and of Persia.

The s[ec/o]nd is the kingdom of the Romans.

The thir[d / is the k]ingdom of the Axumites.

The fourth is the kin/[g]dom of Silis.

These four great kingdoms e[x[5]i]st in the world; there is none that surpasses them. /

Yet, I, I say to you in truth that whoever [will give] / bread and a cup of water*101 to one of my disciples on [account of / the name of G]od, on account of this truth that I have m[an]if[est]/ed; [t]hat one is great before God. [He s]ur10passes these four great kingdoms, which are so g[reat]! / He does more than their armies, because t/hey did not listen to God's truth, nor did they h[el]p / r[ighte]ousness.

Not only this, but whoever will [give] bread / and a cup of water to a catechumen of the [truth, on acc]ount of the 15 name of God and on account of the truth [that is manifest]; / that one is brought near to the [truth. Hi]s end will t[u]/rn to rest for ever.

[Just as the saying] that the [g]ood savi[our] / uttered: W[hoever will give bread and a cup of water] / to one of these least [of the faithfu]l who believe me, on account of the name 20 of a disciple [...] /

Now, [the] savi[our] is callin[g] these saints 'least of the faithful'. / So, I, behold I have proclaimed of the catechumens / [th]at whoever will fellowship with catechumens who are / with the knowledge, and helps them, he surpasses these [ki25n]gdoms that I have counted for you; because all these kingdoms / know not the truth of God. For they {}*102 / the lust of the world and care about livelihood. /

Indeed, due to this, I tell you that these two persons / whom I have named, [the] faithful catechumen and the faithful ri30[ghteous one, are the] ones in wh[om] the Holy Spirit dwells. / [...] he sees [...] Indeed, because of this (190) [he] will give them alms and fellowship with them. / [He] gives it for the Holy Spirit that dwells in them. / The Holy Spirit too will give his thanks be[fore] / his true father. And the true father will repa[y] 5 his reward at the last day because of / the Holy Spirit that dwells in these saints./

How great is this truth that I have unveiled for you, / {}*103. Due to this I have told y[ou]: Bless/[ed] are these who will hear and believe [it, and] set their 10 [h]eart upon it with a single mind [...]

10 Concerning the Fasting of the Saints. /

Once more the enlightener speaks to his disciples: The fa/sting that the saints fast by is profit[able] / for [four] great works.

The first work: S[hall] / the holy man punish his body by fasting, [he sub]15dues the entire ruling-power that exists in him. /

The second: This soul that comes in [to] him in the adm[ini]/stration of his food, day by day; it shall be made holy, [cl]/eansed, purified, and w[ash]ed from the adulteration [of] / the darkness that is mixed in with it.

The third: 20 Th[at] person shall make every deed a holy one; / the mystery of [the children] of light [i]n whom there is neither corruption / nor [...] the food, nor wound it. / [Rat]her, they are holy, [there is nothing] in them that defiles, as they li/[ve] in peace.

The fourth: They make a [... 25 ...] the Cross, they restrain their hands from the hand / [... not] destroy the living soul. /

[The] fasting is profitable to the saints for these four great / [wo]rks should they persist; that is if they are constant in th/[em] daily, and cause the body to make all its 30 [memb]ers to fast [with a] holy [fa]st. /

[...] faith. They who have not strength / [to fast d]aily should make their fast (192) [on] the lord's day. They too make a contribution [to the wor/ks] and the fasting of the saints by their faith and their / alms.

(192,3 – 193,22)

/ The Chapter of the Command [5] ments of Righteousness. /

Summary of essential precepts held by the elect and the catechumens; arranged in two sets of two (by three).

The first righteousness of the elect has three parts: to refrain from all sexual activity; to take great care not to harm the light soul trapped everywhere in matter and especially vegetation (the Cross of Light), for instance by plucking fruit; and not to consume meat or alcohol (192.8 – 13). These correspond to the three seals of mouth, hands and breast discussed by Augustine (signacula oris, manuum et sinus, mor. Manich. VII, 10; IX, 18); and also referred to in eastern Manichaean texts.

The second: to multiply wisdom, faith and grace.

The first righteousness of the catechumenate: fasting, prayer and almsgiving. The catechumens had to support the elect who could do no labour, farming or cooking.

The second: to give someone to the church; to share in their good works; to construct something. The catechumens were allowed to marry and procreate, but were expected to compensate in this way.

[O]nce more] the enlightener speaks to his disciples: Know [and] / understand that the first righteousness a per[son] / will do to make truly righteous is this: he can embra/[ce] continence and purity. And he can also acquire 'the rest [10] [of the] hands', so that he will keep his hand still before the Cross of Li[gh/t]. The third is purity of the mouth, so that he will / keep his mouth pure of all flesh and blood; and not take any taste / at all of the 'wine' name, nor fermented drink. This is the fir/[st] righteousness. If a person will do it in his bo[15][dy], he is pronounced righteous by all mankind. /

Then, the second righteousness that he should do is this: / He can add to it [...] wisdom and faith so that / [...] from his wisdom he can give wisdom, to every person who will he/ar it from him. And also from his faith he can give faith, [20] [to th]ese who belong to the faith. From hi[s grace] he can give freely / of love, shower it upon them, that he might join them to him. / For, when that one acquires a great riches [...] / in righteousness. By this second godliness / he may cause others to be sent, resembling him in [righteous][25]ness.

Just as this righteous one should fulfill the se/cond and become a perfect elect; so too, / if the catechumen shall be a catechu/men of the faith, he is perfected in two stages. /

The first work of the catechumenate that he [30] does is fasting, prayer, and almsgiving. Now, the fa[stin]/g b[y] which he can fast is [th]is: / he can fast on the [lord]'s day [and rest from the] / deeds of the world. [And] the pra[yer is this]: (193) he can pray to the sun and the moon, the great li[ght-givers. The alms]/giving also is this: he can place it [...] / in the holy one, and give it to them in righteous[ness ...] /

[The] second work of the catechumena[te that he] [5] does is this: A person will give a child to the [ch]/urch for the (sake of) righteousness, or his relative [or member] / of the household; or he can rescue someone beset by troub[le; or] / buy a slave, and give him for righteousness. Accordingly, every [go]/od he might do, namely this one whom he gave as a gift [for righ][10]teousness; that catechumen [...] / will share in with them. Thirdly: / A person will build a dwelling or construct some pl[ace]; / so they can become for him a portion of alms in the holy ch[urch]. /

If the catechumen shall ful[fill] [15] these three great works, these three great alm[s that he] / gives as a gift for the h[oly] church [...] / which these alms will achieve. Also, that cate[chu]men / himself, who gave them, he can [... / ...] as he shares in them. The catechumens who will give [...] [20] have great lo[ve ther]ein, and a share of eve[ry] grace / and good in the holy church. They will find many / graces.

/ The Chapter of Fasting, for [25] it engenders a Host of Angels. /

For the Manichaeans the human body and its digestive processes worked in a very literal way so as to purify the divine light, and thus to discard the evil waste matter. Consequently, as Augustine comments, they believed that they 'breathed forth angels (Conf. III.18, IV.1)'.

In this kephalaion one of Mani's disciples, an archegos (leader), recounts how he had joyfully counted the number of angels engendered by the fasting of the elect in his church. However, for some reason (the relevant passage is fragmentary) he had had a change of heart; and now he asks Mani to release him from this responsibility. He seems to be fearful that he might inadvertently sin. However, Mani encourages him, and points out that this kind of responsible position in the church is very necessary. It brings much more good than the actions of people who are only concerned with their own spiritual edification. Mani charges him to use his abilities for the growth of the church.

[O]nc]e again, it happened one time while the apostle is sitting do[wn] / among the congregation. One of his disciples stood up in front of [him]. / He says to him: I have heard you, my master, saying: / 'Seven angels shall be engendered by the fasting of eac[h 30 on]e of the elect; and not only the elect bu[t / the] catechumens engender them on the lord's d[ay'.

The / work] of fasting is this in summary. Now, I, I have [... / ... have p]assed since I became leader. Fif[ty / elect were with m]e in the church over which I became the head. (194) [They stood befo]re me while they fasted every day. / Now, I [took account of the fast]ing that a person performs at these thr/[ee lord's da]ys singly, and I found that each one of these [el/ect] had engendered seven angels by their fasting. So, I 5 [counted the] fasting of the[se] fifty people at the three lo/[rd's da]ys: they totalled three hundred and fifty angels, as seven / [an]gels are reckoned to each one of the elect, who engender / [th]em daily through total fasting. I counted these thr[ee] / lord's days when these fifty people fasted, and [I 10 multi]plied by three. I found: the number of angels en/gendered by them totalled one thousand and fifty, and I / [was grateful] on account of the great profit and go[od] that I had achieved / [on these three] lord's days.

However, I was made to change and beca[me tr]oubled of / [heart]; I had supported [...] this person had committed a sin because of the words [... 15 ...] because of a church, to build [it / ...] to construct it, or because of another necessity / [...] he has sin therein, in these / [...] do I myself sin, I pray, because I command [... / ...] to construct them [...] I shall question myself in my heart 20 [...], saying [...] t[h]u[s / ...] he alone, and he [...] and he [... / ...] and he takes [...] and he [... / ...] them [... / ...] in the presence of God, who will [...] him alone and he supports [.... 25 ...] it is more than [...] my words [...] / the ordinance of their church.

Now I entreat you, my m[aster], / in th[at ...] the worthy thing [...] {obligates}*[106] to restrict me to my own [s/e]lf. Consent and [acquie]sce with me, that I may withdraw to pray[er. / ...] that I may walk in the midst of my brothers lik[e] the elders. Perform this grace for me and re[le]ase me from this power / [of] protection of the gods and an[gels]. /

Then, when the apostle had heard [this word of] that [dis]-(195)ciple, recounting a[bout ..., he] / performed him this grace.

The apos[tle says to the disciple]: / The saying that you uttered, in th[at ... / ...] by your own mouth! 'I k[n]ow that t[his] is a [go]od thing that is achieved by virtue of these fasts, in which these [h]oly peo[ple] / have fasted on the lord's day'; as i[f] / knowing that this thing is entirely beneficial. Then why do they [ask ex/empt]ion from it? For in these words that you have uttered in my presence / you make [...] as if you had not known anything true; because if you had understood the truth and known [the / be]nefit, your heart would not have come after you to ask exemption from [the go/o]d. If you are [e]ager.

You were not ill to make us say it, nor do you [...] / many times. Truly, if you did know the [tru]e benefit / and found your body ailing, sic[k and] troubled, and you having pain many times, then [... And you] / do not cease from doing the work with which you have been entrusted / the whole time you spend [set] firm in the [body / ...]; as you will go to this great l[and] of rest wi[th the] / children of the living. [And you ent]er with glory and [victory to] what you had set your heart upon. You confirm yourself upon them. Indeed, it [will be / to]ld to you: 'A divine work has come about, [your bo]/dy has been found safe for you [...] there being no blemish nor de[str/uction] nor pain for you'. And after all these things, I wi[ll / ...] you, so that you wish [...] to complete the good, together with that which I have assigned to you.

Now, if you can ask exemption from this matt[er] / and this divine work, are there also others like you / to decline it? Then indeed, all this sort of benefit and / every divine [wo]rk: whoever will do it? For wise people [... / ...] who know the truth, who are like you, shall not att[30]ain the benef}it [...] that you have given them. They will commit this sin [... / ... so]ul. However, I, this is how I have (196) [...] elders / [...] you in it, and you do the work that I have proclaimed / [to y]ou [and assig]ned to you, and a benefit co[mes about / i]n your life. Even if others should {strive}*[107] [5] [to] ask exemption [...] do not {strive} / [to a]sk exemption from it. And also, [si]nce thus I am telling / you in truth [...] that greater is the {gl/ory a]nd the victory and the goo[d] of the one who preaches, building / [the] church; than that of the brother who turns [h]is heart in[10]w[ard] and keeps himself to himself, and edifies only himself. /

Ne[vertheless, o]n the matter of the word that [you have] uttered: 'Suppose I have si/[n] at the time when I shall proclaim some word by my [mou/th] concerning building a church or alms' [... / ...] your heart is pained [...] or you are afraid because the person [15] [...] concerning the church's work and the helping of they who / [... as] he commands he edifies by his word, and has no sin / {ther]ein.

However, the person who speaks, commanding / [...] some thing [...] his own need, just as / [...] his [f]lesh [... fo]urteen; or he hastens [20] [...] works that are defil[ed ... / ...] themselves to take his o[wn] care. Therefore, the one who speaks / [...] of this matter, is set utterly in sin. / [...] he is silent and does not proclaim [... / an]y word.

In contrast, you, I assign to you this a[25][lo]ne: Have you power to preach and to build the chu/r[c]h of God, for your toil will be reckoned to your benefit. /

W[he]n that disciple heard these things from the apos[t]/le, he paid homage to him. He says to him: My mast[er], I have received / the word that you have proclaimed to me. I will preach and bu[ild] [30] the church. Only, may your power and glory / aid me! (197)

/ The Chapter of / Righteous [Judgement]. /

A disciple, one of the teachers, asks Mani as to whether righteous anger is a sin or can be justified. The apostle asserts that anger in the service of righteous judgement can be constructive; and he distinguishes it from other kinds of anger that are unacceptable. A strong reprimand can lead to repentance.

Mani uses the analogy of a wise doctor who will on occasion use a cool remedy, and at other times a hot one. These correspond to the two aspects of love and fear; and Mani points out that both of these are revealed in the heavenly sun and the moon. Thus they are able to purify the divine soul that passes through the totality. Therefore, the disciple too is right to use both aspects, in his dealings with the brothers and sisters.

[Onc]e again one among the disciples who [...] [5] apostle. He says to him: I beseech you [that / y]ou may convince me about this lesson, if I may ask you. For [you have to/ld] us that [...] and you give [...] is / [...] their brothers [...] the judgement [... / ...] in accordance with right[eousness ... 10 Concerning the Man who is ug[l]y / in his Body, [but] beautiful / [in his Soul]. /

This chapter begins with a touching story about how Mani publicly embraces one of the elect, despite his deformity, in front of the assembled congregation who are laughing at his ugliness. It is the inner new man, formed by the Light Mind and religious practice, that is of lasting value.

This then leads Mani to develop an extended parable about pearls in their shells (the living soul in the physical body), pearl divers (the apostles), and traders (the sun and the moon). Mani like Jesus frequently used parables for effective teaching, and this motif of the pearl without price has an obvious heritage stemming from the Gospels through early Syriac Christian literature.

However, one distinctive feature of Mani's teaching was his desire to combine religious truths with total scientific knowledge, in order to establish a complete and integrated understanding of the world. Thus this parable begins with a lengthy discourse on the formation of pearls and their shells. While such features are of great historical interest for modern scholars, they did make Manichaeism a rather static religion, its teachings too easily undercut by advances in science.

[Once] again it happened one time, while the apost[l]e is [sitting among / a] great gathering, as some [... be]fore 15 [the] teachers and elders [... / ...] by the leaders and first citi[zens]. Now, he / [is s]itting down in their midst. All of a su[dden] one / of the elect came in to his presence, but no[t ... / ... he] is an elect [... 20 ...] his commandments. *[115] This phrase recurs at 203.16 (see also 201.15), and links the two halves of the kephalaion. Presumably, the ugly elect is compared to a perfect pearl, which then leads the disciples to their question about how such are formed.

[25] Concerning Wisdom; it is far superior when on the Tongue / than in the Heart of the Person. /

Mani uses the analogies of a child who is born, and of fire that blazes from wood, to explain why wisdom is superior when it is proclaimed to when it lies silent in the heart.

However, wisdom is not always listened to, nor well-received. In a second speech Mani extends the same two analogies, showing that strangers may reject a child, and the blind can not see the fire.

Once again, on one occasion, one of the disciples sto/od up before the apostle. He questioned him, saying: / I entreat you, my master, that you might instruct me. [30] Behold, when a person will be taught wise wisdom / in his heart, and he seals it in his doctrine, so sh[al]l you find / him rejoicing greatly about it. However, [sh]all his [... / ...] to him, more th[an] when he may proc[laim ...] (205) and utter it. He shall be enlightened by it, and [t]hat [wisdom] / shall shine forth the more in him. It is unveil[ed be]/fore him, and through it he assumes power and truth. /

That disciple speaks further before the a[po][5]stle: I understand [...] / that this word I have uttered is correct. I know that the w[i]s/-dom I have been taught is spread through my heart and perfected in [m]y / soul. (However), it is not found like the splendour in me, so that I regard it / [ad]vanced, except when I shall proclaim it [10] by my mouth and utter it to others. Indeed, when / I proclaim it, I am giving it to the ears [of] / others to hear. Would I do these same things, even if I had never heard it / in [my] days of being? Would I desire greatly and [m]y / [h]eart be drawn to the wisdom I now proclaim? [I entreat [15] y]ou, my master, that you might instruct me as to [w/hy] this wisdom becomes more advanced when I / [p]roclaim it, than when it is sealed in my heart.

Then / the apostle [s]peaks to that disciple: Well / [do] you ask! And great is this lesson for which you have sought, [that is] w[20]hence comes my great joy, on account of this wis/dom that I utter? [...] it is superior in my mouth when / [I] proclaim it than when it is set in m[y heart]. / [Y]ou yourself rejoice in it; and the other one who / [h]ears it from you, he shall rejoice in it, and be enlightened [25] [by] it and receive thereby permanent strength. /

For like this matter, just so a small b/[o]y who is conceived in the belly of his mother. He / [... he] turns in his mother's womb, filling her womb. / [The m]other knows and understands that this child she conceives [30] is alive within her. She rejoices over him until / [the tim]e when she gives birth. And he comes from her alive with his / [limbs whole] and perfect in beauty, without defect, (206) [in] the living open air that is more sp/[ac]ious than the first air he was in. / [He] fills his eyes with the light and speaks with his livi[ng] voice / in the way of they who are born.

Now, the time w[5][h]en this woman conceives the child in her belly, / her joy at conceiving him in her womb is not so [ve]ry great as / when she gives birth and sees him; and is full of his / [be]auty and stature in the space of a single moment. / [T]he love and joy over him shall be a hundred [10] [t]imes greater than it was, now that she has given birth and seen him.

For / the first time when she conceived him in her belly, / [h]is beauty and the sight of his eyes was hidden from his m[o/th]er; but when she gave birth to him she saw his beauty. His / s[t]ature and his loveliness came before the e[ye]s of his f[15]athe[r a]nd his mother and all his relatives. They shall rejoic[e] / over him more and more when they look upon him / face to face and see his beauty and delightfulness. /

Just as in this simile, the wisdom that is present [in] / the heart of the person is like the living child who is co[nceived] [20] in the belly of his mother. And when he / is taught and seals it in his heart, it becomes like / the child who shall be born, and they see his beauty. /

So, in this way, the wisdom that the person proclaims, speak[ng] / it from his heart, shall be advanced more and mor[e]. [25] Its enhancement and glory shall double from the time when the bea/-uty and splendour of the saying will be displayed before the eyes [of / t]hey who hear it, and it shall also advance for you [... / ...] your hearing, and you are astonished at what you proclai[m]. /

Once again, the wisdom is like this, while it is hidden in the heart of the person. [Bef]/ore he has uttered it, it is just like [the blaze] / of fire that is hidden in wood. An[d] that wood is [set aflame] / by the blaze of the fire, but the garment of fir[e that exists in] / the wood is not apparent. Indeed, you can see [...] (207) wood and they put them in a single house. It is impossible to [put li]/ght to that house as long as the light within [...] / until the time when they are added to the fire, and the light [comes f]/orth from them. It is possible for that entire house [to be] lit by the light of a single piece of wood. /

This is also the case with the wisdom that is in the heart of the person. [It] / is like the fire that is hidden in the wood, as its light is / not [d]isplayed. For its part, the wisdom is like this: its li/ght is hidden and its glory is hidden in the heart; but when the person will proclaim it, its glory shall be displayed be/fore the eyes and the ears of a multitude.

Once / again, for a second time this disciple speaks to the apostle: / So, if the wisdom is like the paradigms / you have taught me, why are there some people who shall hear the word of wisdom and rejoice in it and give glory / to it; when others shall listen to it and neither rejoice / [i]n it nor receive glory amongst them? /

[Beh]old, the apostle speaks to him: I will persuade you and / satisfy you about this belief, so that I teach you with clarity of vision.

For in this respect the wisdom is / like this child about whom I have told you, the one who / [was] born from the woman. Now, when he will be born, / his father and mother and family circle shall / [r]ejoice over him. However, you find others grieving by reason of him, [s]ince they are strangers to him. These are not reckoned among his family. / [They do n]ot rejoice over him, because he is not of their race. /

This is also [the case] with the wisdom. When / it is proclaimed by the mouth of the teacher, these who / are [a]kin to it shall receive it to them and rejoice in it; but [those] who are strangers to it neither rejoice in it / [...] nor receive it to them. /

shall come from the wood / [and be apparent o]utside before the eyes of every one. (208) So, [wh]oever looks shall see the light that has [come / fro]m the wood; but whoever is blind does not see the / [fir]e.

This is also the case with the wisdom, / when it will be proclaimed. The person, in whom is the [5] [Mi]nd, of him is the wisdom. Whenever he may hear it, / he shall receive it in to him; but the one who has no Mind in him is a / stranger to it. He neither receives it in to him, nor shall he listen to [it]. /

When that disciple heard these things, he rejoiced gre/atly. He was persuaded in his heart about what had been proclaimed to him. He made obeisanc[e] [10] and sat down.

/ Concerning the Cross of Light: / [...] trample / upon it.

The divine light that is crucified in matter throughout the cosmos, (a universalisation of the christological themes of incarnation and atonement), is symbolised and even personified in a number of figures. The Cross refers principally to that most rich source of light: vegetation and all plant life, where the divine hangs on every tree or bush or herb.

In consequence the elect, who hoped to be saved in this one life rather than suffer reincarnation, were at great pains never to harm the Cross; excepting the necessary pain involved in its liberation through the digestive system of the elect themselves.

In this chapter a disciple is concerned about the inadvertent harm he might do in such situations as when sent on a mission journey, or when himself requested to ask for alms. The elect had to take great care wherever they trod, and it was the catechumens who prepared their diet, offering it as alms to them. Mani is anxious to assert that any tasks undertaken for the building up of the church, and thus for the ultimate salvation of the light, even where short-term pain is inflicted on the living soul, can cause no sin. He was very practical in his role as an apostle, and clearly aware that the divine teaching must not lead to self-defeating passivity in the face of the world. Here he uses the analogy of a good doctor who must first cause pain before healing can be achieved.

[15] Onc[e] again another disciple questioned the apostle, saying / to him: I have heard you, my master, say in the congregation / of the church, that it is proper for the person to watch / his step while he walks on a path; lest he trample the Cro/ss of Light with his foot, and destroy vegetation. Also, it counts firs[t] [20] for any creeping creature, lest he trample upon it and kill it with his foot. /

However, on occasion the superior, [who commands me], may send me to some foreign coun/t[ry] about a godly matter [...] of the church. / Sometimes, also, a teacher [of the] church where I am, or / some of the foreign brethren, may [ask me] about a portion of al[m][25]s, concerning some food that they need. I know / that what I do is good, as I am obeying the one who commands [me], / who sends me on the road to a foreign country. Again, if I [take] / up the alms and it is brought to the church, the br[others] / and the sisters can take their sufficiency of it. I know and perce[30]ive that I have therein a great success, by this matter. [Never]/theless, I am also afraid lest in any way I commit a sin when [I wa]/lk on the path, as I trample upon the earth, [tre]ading on [the Cro]/ss of Light, and make [...] (209) without force in my sole on the path, as I walk o[n it].

[W]/hen the apostle heard these words from that [dis]/ciple, he says to him: You have recounted the lesson [like] / this, and it is well composed. Still, listen, and I may well per[suade] [5] you about it! Now, when you walk on [your] / way about some godly matter, as your command[ing] superior / sends you, you do no sin therein. For y[ou are] not [wa]/lking there about some lustful matter, nor concerning [... / ...] of advantage, wherein is sin; but you make y[our] [10] walkway due to the work of God, as you hasten [... not] / because of your own desire. /

[I]ndeed, I, I tell you (pl.) with a great voice: / Every elect and righteous person who walks on a path / due to the work of God, and though w[al]king upon the ear[th] and though [15] treading with the soles of his feet on the Cross of Light, / he does no sin therein. Rather, a crown and palm-branch is his entire path; / because he walks not by his own desire, / nor hastens about an acquisition a[nd] worthless things, / as he tramples upon the earth and the Cross of Light.

[20] [H]owever, the other person who hastens on the path because of his own lu/st and [...] of his body, as he [...] / his own about an acquisition and [...] things [...] / a total sin is the walkway of that person, / walking on the path of sin and error.

[...] behold, I have told you (pl.): Any one who, if his teacher will send him, / goes on a path about some godly matter, a total victory / is his path. Still, you (sg.) also recounted this: 'I trample u/[p]on the earth and the Cross of Light, I oppress with my / [sole]'. As you say: 'Perhaps I have therein sin because of [the de]ed'.

Again, do not be afraid even with this; because the / liv[ing soul] is like this. As a person, (210) if a disease will take hold of his limbs, and his heart / [is sl]ow, his soul distressed, and he has pain in his di[se/a]se. He seeks after a doctor to cure him, to make him strong of heart. / And he cures, attends to, and gives him health [from] the disease that has risen up against him. So he thinks about this. /

[And] a wise person comes, knowing the formulas proper to a skilled / doctor. If he shall achieve a healing of the one whom he [... / ...] it, he recites over him the formulas that he knows, / and he even tramples with his foot upon all his limbs! That [pe]r-son, who is ill, knows that this person / is trampling upon him so that he might achieve a healing; rather, not do/ing this to him out of some enmity he had / against him beforehand. Instead, all that he does, / he does to hi[m that] he might make a healing of his body. And he expels [the] disease and the pain, trampling upon him / to occasion this benefit. That person, who is ill, he can / bear no anger nor hatred against this doctor, who tramp[les] / upon him. He can not hate him out of enmity, because he kn/ows that he does this to him to his benefit.

However, should someone come and trample upon him in enmity; he may / hate, prevent and not permit him! For he kno/ws that he tramples upon him in enmity; and as he strikes / out of a wanton whim, he piles another illness upon his di[se]/ase.

Again, this too is the case with the living soul; whether in the earth, or in the Cross of Light. Should you walk a[long] / upon it on the path, should you trample the Cross, it may take no reckon[ing] / against you in anger nor wrath. For it knows that [you] / walk upon it for relief and healing, to proclaim on its behalf. [You] / walk because of it, to reveal its mysteries. Also, the di[str][30]ess of the bones, which you have oppressed, befits not si[n], / but is set towards the victory. As the savi[our] has said: [Where] / your heart is, your treasure also will come to [be there]*[120]. (211) Again, because of this nothing will be lost for you du[e to] / the distress of the bones and your toil; rather, it all accumul[ates] / to the relief (of the soul).

Also, as to this other (case) that you have [rec]/ounted: 'The occasion when a teacher would come up to me, or some foreign brethren, [5] and I speak about the alms; perhaps that word / will lead to a wound, and hurt the [Li]ght Cross?' / Again, do not be afraid even in this; because there is a dist/inction between words! For this is not any saying. Rather, the wo/rd that wounds is this: should a person utter a sayi[ng] [10] for the sake of the murder of a person, or the murder of animals, or for [the sake of] / the murder of trees and the Cross of Light, the ly/ing word and the wrathful and the bitter, or a word of en/vy and [...] only, or a word of accusation, which some/one will spread against his brother; this is the [wor]d that wounds [...] [15] Should the person utter it, it befits [si]n; because [he has br]ought forth / from it the demons [...] concerning this / [...] the righteous person, or [...] / all of them, which I have proclaimed, in order that [...] his word to the fet/ter; because anyone who would [...] his word to the [fet]ter. [20] And again, he [...] his coming forth, they will bind him in / the place wherein he has bound his [...]

Nevertheless, so far as [... / ...] word for the [...] not go [...] / nor will they write it [...] wound [...] / word for the release of the soul [...] for the mystery [25] [of its] healing; because the righteous person, who speaks to the nee/[d of the] alms, speaks to its healing and its gathering in. /

[He is li]ke this, a wise doctor who might turn back [... / ...] his disease. As a wound is in his body, he cuts / [...] this person who is ill, in his wisdom, [... [30] ...] he [...] this wound, and he cuts it. After these things / [...] and he places the soluble drugs upon it, so that / [they will be able to diss]olve. He might incise it with the iron, and he casts it out (212) [f]rom him, with the soluble drugs. And the wound is purified / [fr]om the fever. After these events, he shall place the soothing drugs / [...] and it heals up. That person, who is ill, he shall give / [...] but he shall not [... 5 ...] he [shall not] generate anger in his heart against him; beca/use he knows that he is making the aspect of his benefit and his / heal[ing]. After the cut that he may make, and the cauterizing that he may / do there, he shall even give rewards to the doctor! He gives / his thanks and is a friend to him his whole life through.

10 Again, this is [how] he is like the doctor, namely the elect / person who encourages the alms-giving and gathers it / in, bringing it to the church. Also, the alms / is like the person who is [ill], because the power of the ene/my is mixed in with it [...] it is gathered 15 [...] to the c[h]urch. It will be purified in the image / of the saints. That [alms-giv]ing will not be able to be saved / without toil and pain, because they [... / ...] which they che[w], / as they eat it [...] and other pain. 20 However, there is no other mode for the alms than this, because he / is its gateway to come forth [...] from the world / in affliction.

Similarly, the holy church / that the apostle shall establish in the world. For with/out toil and pain the elect shall not find strength to become free f25rom the world. Rather, only by the consideration of [...] / and that of prayer, and of self-control, and of [...] / and of only-begottenness, and of withdrawal, wo[unds] / and lashings, the discipline of the chains, the [... / ...] At first these things [... 30 ...] and these pains [...] they inherit [...] / for ever and ever. Whoever [...] / he has not rest therein, in the land of the living ones. Again, this / is [also the case] with this living alms-giving. It shall suff[er] (213) pain for a while, and an eternal rest [co]/mes to it from the saints.

However, this I command / you, my brothers and my limbs: Let no pers[on] / unleash his hand and strike this living Cross [...] 5 wantonness and gluttony. Rather, be a leader [fo]r (the alms-giving) / by word to the catechumens. For even the word, see, / we utter it as you utter it. Thus (the alms) exist / in great distress, and you should be mindful to eat it. Do / not eat it in wantonness nor dissipation nor revelry 10 nor gluttony. Rather, eat it in great hunger, and / drink it in great thirst, and take care of your b[o]/dy with it.

Then speaks the apostle to that di/sciple: Behold, you have heard what I have proclaimed to you / about your own longing. You have no s[i]n therein.

15 [W]hen this disciple heard these things, he was persuaded and rejoiced greatly. / He says to him: I give thanks to you my master, for you persuade / us, as to occasion, about everything. You give ease to our heart with / loving-kindness from now [...] by the ears [...] / living will live [...] by your lessons of life 20 [th]at we have heard from you.

*/ The Chapter of the Man / who asks: Why [am] I / sometimes at peace, and trou*25 bled at other times? /

Mani explains to a disciple that the Light Mind cleanses the soul and makes it a new man, at peace and untroubled. Nevertheless, even such a person still remains prey to disturbances and emotions caused by his star signs. Also, food and drink, being a mixture of light and darkness, can lead either to peace or disturbance depending upon the level of its purity. The positive and living balance of the nourishment becomes greater on account of justified souls who have come into it through transmigration; and thus these ally easily with the light within the person, and he is at peace.

Mani remarks (216.4 - 6) that such justified souls are those who have perfected their deeds, and 'their dues have ceased (ⲁ ⲛⲟⲧⲱⲃϯⲁⲟⲧⲉ ⲱⲥⲛⲉ)'. This sounds very like the Buddhist doctrine of karmic consequences, and may provide important evidence that Mani was substantially rather than just superficially influenced by Indian teachings.

On the problematic question of the 'roots' and 'conduits (ⲁⲓⲣⲙⲉ)' see chapter 48.

[On]ce again a disciple speaks to our enlightener: I beseech you, / [m]y master, that you might explain to me this lesson I would ask you. /

Sometimes [I] am peaceful in my heart, as my consideration / [is constructive], and all my doctrines are ordered and in place. I conduct 30 [...] my wor[k]s, as I utter my words to all people /

[with swe]etness. I am peaceful of heart in the gladness of the Mind. (214) Even my body is carefree, and my soul / [rejo]ices in wisdom and true knowledge.

There are also times / when I shall be troubled. My doctrines are confused. Gloom increa/ses with them, and grief and anger and envy and lu[5]st. I am troubled, struggling with all my might that I would sub/due them; not finding the strength of mind to subdue them at that hour nor / day when they surged up in me. And all these evil teachings / and wicked considerations come forth. They have tormented / me. I do not comprehend, because there is no single shape in all these cou[ns][10]els that have entered me. Are they revealed to me, or / ind[eed did] they enter me from outside and have been shaken in to me? I / do not know if they have wakened within me alone, have / re[belled] inside me and set themselves up against me. I do not know / about [th]at. Howe[ver, th]is only I understand: that [15] I shall be ver[y] badly confused in all my doctrines. I shall / do [...] in my [work]s, and you find my word is worthless in / my mouth. I shall not find how [...], and I become a source of trouble and confus[ion] / for my brothers. Even my body rises up against me, and sick[ens] / for that entire day.

Again, there are other times [y][20]ou shall find my heart carefree, as I rejoice and am glad. My wisd[om] / is sweet for me, and the preaching. My heart is drawn to the fas/ting with which I fast. I shall not wish to stop p[raying]. / You find all my doctrines tranquil, while my other thoughts are j[oyful], / my body being carefree. I shall not slacken as I recite psalm[s, and [25] not] stop saying prayers. I am right indulgent [to] / my brothers, because I am governed by the / constructive state.

So now I beseech you, my master, / that you might persuade me about these two matters. I have tested them [in] / my own body, but not comprehending the ma[nner] [30] by which [they] come in to me. /

Then the apostle speaks [thus] to t[he di]sci[ple]: / Well do you ask about this lesson. B[ehold], I [will explain] it [to you]! (215) Understand this: The soul that assumes the body, / [w]hen the Light Mind will come to it, shall be purified by the power o[f] / wisdom and obedience, and it is cleansed and ma[de] / a new man. There is no trouble in (the soul), nor confusion nor [dist][5]urbance.

However, when a disturbance will arise for [him] / and he will be troubled, this disturbance shall go in to him in [...], / first through his birth-signs and his difficult stars that [...] / they turn over him and stir him and trouble him with / lust and anger and depression and grief, as he wi[10]lls. Also, as he wills, the powers of heaven shall trouble him through the[ir] / roots, to which he is attached.

Again, there are times you shall find the [powers / of] heaven are peaceful and tranquil for him, and it comes to [... / a] difficult part comes into him by the nourishment that he has eaten, / or else indeed in some [...] or in the water that they have drunk. [15] Again, trouble and confusion and anger [will] increase in him, a[nd / l]ust multiplies upon him together with depression and grief; becau/se of the nourishment of the bread he has eaten and the water he has drunk, / which are full of bothersome parts, a vengeful counsel. They shall / enter his body, [mixed in] with these foods, and they [20] even become joined in with the wicked parts of the body and / the sin that is in him; transferring the anger and the lust and / the depression and the grief, these wicked thoughts of the body. /

Now, [beh]old, I have explained to you that should you be troubled [... / ...] them through the c[ondui]ts and the r[oot]s of they above [... [25] ... the f]ood that comes in to you.

There are times, however, / [if] you shall find that the nourishment that comes into you is pure [... / ...], so it is greater in light and life w[hile the / wast]e is less in it, and the evil-doing is diminished [f/rom it]. Even the atmosphere above is still, being purified through the [... [30] ...] also the image is calmed from [... / ...] increases in you through (216) [th]ose good parts of the food that come i/[n] to you. And they find you at ease and tranquil, as you are / well gover[n]ed in your abodes because of / [the] living [p]art, which is greater on account of the light of these [ju]stified souls [5] that are in it. The ones that have perfected their deed/[s]. Their dues have ceased, while their soul is carefree / [...] they have been allied with these living souls that / [are p]resent in you. Due to this you shall find them in you, / [c]alm in tranquillity, and they come from you without tro[1]•[uble; a]nd you are found flourishing of body. Even your de/[eds] are determined, being well constructed after their manner, and your doct/[rines are in] order, as your words [...] your soul is ca[re]/free within you, ascending like a bird. /

Behol[d, I have] explained to you the determination of this lesson for which you [15] asked: Whe[nce] come [th]ese bad counsels and considerations / in to you, these vengeful thoughts that trou[bl]/e; and also whence come in to you these good counsels / and sweet doctrines, when your Mind is cal/med for you. I have told you that when [your bo]dy*[121] is troubled, you [20] shall be troubled by the conduits of they below, the difficult parts / that come in to you by fo[od and the] act of eating. Aga[in], when / the conduits above are calmed from you, even your fo/od that has come in to you is clear and pure. Your heart shall be found / ordered in its place, your counsels at peace from disturb[ance].

[25] Then, when that disciple had heard these things, he glorified [... / ...] the apostle. He says to him: You are glorious and bless[ed]! / The living [...] that came from you have been added to us. We [... / ... b]elieve you. For everything that we ask of you, you [per/suade] us about it with sweetness; you [... [30]• ... the so]uls.

/ Concerning the Alms, that [...] / life in the Church. /

Although all the sects of the world may make offerings of alms in the name of God, it is only the holy church of the elect that can purify the light. Thus the elect are the only means for its release; and they themselves depend wholly upon the catechumens, who give the alms.

Mani compares the catechumens to good earth in which the good tree of the elect can grow. Similarly, the living soul can only ascend to rest through the sun and the moon, and again these light-givers will only rest in the land of light. So, too, both the elect and the catechumens will finally find rest in the land of light.

*121 Reading ⲡⲥⲁⲗ [ⲡⲉⲕⲥⲱ]ⲙⲁ

Once [again, it] h[appened one time. The enlightener sat] (217) in the midst of the congregation. He says to his disciples: / All these alms are donated in the world because of the / name of God; that is every sect overall (uses) his name. / Their catechumens give them in the name of [5] God. Everywhere these alms will be received for him they are accompanied / by sorrow and affliction and wickedness. [There is no] / rest nor open door that they can come out by and find an / opportunity to go to the God in whose name they were given; ex/[ce]pt only the holy church wherein the com[m][10]andments of alms are established, thro[ugh which] they fulfil / the will of the exalted one.

Now, the holy church / exists in two forms: in the brothers and / the sisters. Indeed, when these alms reach the holy / c[h]urch, they shall be [redee]med through it and purified and r[15]est therein. They shall come from it and [go] to the / God of truth in whose name they were given. / Thus it is this holy church itself that is the place of re[st] / for all those alms that shall rest therein; / and it becomes a doorway for them and a conveyance to that land [20] of rest. Also, the holy church / has no place of rest in this entire world exce/pt for through the catechumens who listen to it, as [...] / only with the catechumens who give it rest. For / [it]s honour is with the catechumens, through whom it shall be pass[25][ed on].

What does the assembly of catechu/[me]ns resemble? It is like good earth / [...] in which the gardener shall plant a good tree. [Beho]ld, / [th]at good tree transforms the power and the [... / ...] of all earth, and it produces good fruit. [30] [Th]at [gardener] sets at ease the tree of life, and he r/[ests himself].

This too is the case with the [holy] chu/[rch]. It is like a good tree. (218) The assembly of the catechumens is li/ke this good earth that shall receive the good seed. / See how large is the assembly of the cate/chumens! For it is like good earth, since i[5]t also shall receive to it the holy church. / It shall provide for it, and give it rest from all its deeds / and sufferings. It shall become a place of rest for it, / [s]ince (the church) rests in it everywhere. The place wher[e]/in there are no catechumens does not have the ho[ly] church [10] resting there.

Likewise this [liv]ing sou[l] / that today is set in mixture; for it wishes / to [as]cend and go to the house of its people, but it kn/ow[s a]nd understands that it has no open door in all the powers / of heaven and earth. For they are its oppression that [...] it everywhere. Indeed, it has no open door / except the sun and the moon themselves, the light-givers of the heavens [... / ...] they become the place of rest for it. And they become a door that opens for it / [in] the coming forth, and (the soul) comes out through them to the country of the household of i[ts] / people. Again, further in, also the light-givers of the heavens have no place of rest amongst all the powers of heaven; except for the lan[d] / of light, that has indeed been theirs for ever.

So, thus / the living soul is purified of all afflictions; / and they provide a rest for it, and open a door that opens to the house [of] / its people.

Also, it is the case that the land of lig[25]ht will become the final receiver for the light-givers of [the] / heavens, and they will rest themselves therein and rule in it [for] / ever.

Again, this is how the [ho]ly church / shall become the place of rest for the alms of the cat[e]/chumens; and the catechumens themselves become the [30] place of rest for the holy church. Nevertheless, both the former and the [latter], / the place of rest wherein they will be at peace [is the land] / of light. (219)

/ Concerning the Catechumen who found / fault with the Elect: why he is angry. /

Mani castigates a catechumen for finding fault with the elect, though they are sometimes angry, and do not always behave righteously. He compares the elect to a sweet scented and spice-bearing tree. Certainly, its branches may give off acrid smoke when burnt. Nevertheless, the tree is not cut down; but rather, it is carefully cultivated for the good things it produces. Similarly, the elect are placed in an evil material body; and this may cause them to be angry. The catechumen should know about the mystery of the two essences. Mani points out that the elect do not blame him for his frailty, for living in the world. Rather, they love him, and seek always to help him. So, too, this catechumen should always look to what is constructive.

Once again, it happened one time. A catechumen stood before my master, the apostle. He says to him: / If when I see a righteous one being angry and resentful as he quar/rels with his friend, turning his anger on him a[nd utterin]/g ugly words, not giving in to him; [at that] / moment when I see them arguing with each other [... ...] it is obvious that they are not righteous, / [...] and it is obvious that they are not established in the truth / of [...] condemn them. Directly I shall find fault, s[a]ying: / If these are righteous, why are they / angry? For what reason do they quarrel with each other? Why would one abuse another, as if they had nothing in the un/iverse on which they stand firm? /

Then our enlightener spea[ks] to tha[t] catechumen: / The [saying] that you have uttered is not a constructive saying. You [do] not re/peat it well. Do not be [in]structed by foolishness [...] that it comes to be in you. Rather, know and understand / what you see [...] is clear to you, that these / [...] it shall produce oil [...]-plants. Its aro/ma, and the spices that [shall come] from it, is made use of / by kings and [...] Just as this tree that produces sc[ente]d oil: If a person plucks a bough / and cuts a branch off it and puts it on the fire, / it shall give off abundant smoke / [...] separate from it; but no person [... / ...] this scented oil that has come from it should give perfume to the smoke and ash, and they take an axe / [...] and destroy the entire tree! Rather, they shall make the other / [...] the cultivator of that tree and they nurture it b/[ecause of the s]c[en]t that shall come from it. /

This [is also the case] with the elect. [They are] gods (220) as they stand firm in the image of the gods. The divinity / that is planted in them came to them from the heights and / [dw]elt in them. They have done the will of the greatness. /

F[urther], when they will be troubled and angry and resentful, [they] curse each other. However, do not you be troubled in yo/ur heart. You know, once and for all, they are established in a bo/dy that is not their own, hating the flesh of sin that makes the oth[er] / dwell in a foreign land. Due to this they shall be angry, / and say and utter hard words to each others' faces. Still, when you might see them / angry and wrathful, do not doubly criticise them; do not / speak against them; do not reject them in your heart; / and do not distance yourself from them. Do not ask why th/ey are angry or why quarrelling would aris[e] [15] be[tw]een them. For you have known the mystery of the t[w]o essences, / you have understood that [wha]t is good and what is evil dwell in / every person. You have also understood that the saints bear a great bur/den on their shoulders. So, inasmuch as you have known / all these things, it [is n]ot constructive [to] utter words like this about [20] the saint. For you [your]self have unde[rstood] that they carry / a great burden, they are establis[hed in] the body that is not the/ir own.

Understand also this other [point]: You st/and in sin constantly! You spend your lifetime in eat/ing and drinking, in lusting after women, gold [and] [25] silver. Your hands are always free to beat the Cro/ss of Light. Behold, you are stuck in all these sins. / The saints watch you as you commit them. Neverthe[less], / they neither mock you nor hate you. Nor are they distant / to you. Nor shall they say, 'Inasmuch as he sins like this, I [30] will not be his teacher'. Rather, they shall accept [you] / in love and sweetness; they shall speak wit[h you] / in the wisdom of God, teaching you as you [... / ...] your dissipations and your deeds [...] (221) that are sins, and they perform for you all these charities. / They say to you: 'You are our brother. You / are one of our congregation, a companion who will journey with us to the land / of light'.

Behold now, you see how great is the love [5] that they have for you! They bear with you as a friend. / For your part, this is told to you so that you may love / and honour them. Do not speak against them when / you may see something disgraceful among them, being wrathful / with each other.

Then, when the apostle had utt[10]ered these words to that catechumen, he was persuaded / in his heart. He says to him, weeping: Forgive me / my sins, for I have truly understood, my master, about all these things / that you have taught me. For when quarr/elling will arise among the saints [... [15] ...] because the old man too dwells in their [b]ody; / and due to this they shall take offence [... and] / they {dispute}*[122] with one another.

/ The Chapter of the Nazo[20]rean who questions the Teacher. /

A member of one of the Jewish-Christian sects seeks to trap Mani by asking him whether his God is good or evil. Presumably he was expected to answer along the lines of Marcionite dualism, with its rather naive division of moral attributes, wherein the good God is wholly loving and merciful without any judgemental qualities. However, in marked contrast, Mani replies that God is a judge. He then explains that while a judge is responsible for the administration of justice, any harm that befalls a sinner he brings upon his own head. Equally the righteous have nothing to fear, for they will receive their reward.

Once again, it happened one time, a Nazorean came before / the apostle. He says to him, I will ask you one wo/rd! You, for your part, persuade me with a single word; / but not many words.

The apostle speaks to him: [25] So, [if] you are able to utter to me a single word, then I / [my]self will also utter to you a single word. However, if / you may ask many, then again I too will proclaim to you / a multitude!

That Nazorean says to the a/postle: Your God, to whom you pray, as you believe in him, [30] is he good or evil?

Then says the apo/[stle] to that Nazorean: So, pay attention, / [see you have] not [asked] a single word; but you have asked a / [mass of words! Then] the apostle says to him: A (222) [ju]dge is my God.

And then also that Nazo/rean says to him: Yet I see that there is no city / judge not wont to do evil! For everywhere that a ju/[d]ge is, there are lashes, should he strike people [5] with them. There are racks, should he punish them o/n them. There are neck chains at his disposal, should he cast them upon them. / Also the sword, that he should put them to death by it. The judge shall / do all these things in the city, but all of them are wickednesses. / Look now, you see that the judge is an evil-doer!

[10] The apostle, in turn, speaks to him: The judge is / not a man of wickedness, but rather the work counteracts wickednes[s], / limiting the evil. Nevertheless, what you have recounted is that the jud/ge shall go and punish, kill and slay. He acts / like this that he might annul the evil and impede [15] the wickedness in the pe[rs]on; and lay it upon the head of the sinn/er.

At any rate, pay attention to this: You shall find a great / many people, free and good, are before the / judge's seat; and he shall not sin against them, [n]or shall he / ruffle their clothing! Also, he shall not cause them reason to fear [so] [20] l[o]ng as they have not sinned. For his part, he shall not err against these / among them. However, the occasion when, if someone will do some wicked/ness, and the ones whom he has sinned against catch him, and they seize and bring [him] / before the judge; he shall indeed bring his sin and his wi[ck]edn[ess] / upon his own head. Now look and see: [25] The evil shall not come about from the judge, nor shall they call / him 'sinner'; rather the one who does the wickedness, [he] shall / set his wickedness upon his own head. Al[so], he who has done / what is right and beneficial; again, he shall be paid recomp[en]/se for the goodness that he has done.

Again, th[is] also [i]s the way [30] of God. And he too is a judge of souls. [Should they] / obey the devil and do this that is evi[l; should they not be won] / over to the truth and the knowledge that are in [...] (223) wickedness [...] and he condemns them by their works. / He shall not accept them at their last, rather they shall be made a portion of the d[ev]/il whom they have loved. Even as the saviour has said: [Whe]/re your (pl.) heart is, your treasure will co[me to be] [5] there*[123]. Thus these souls too, according to [their heart] / and according to their treasure, which they have placed before the dev[il, they will] / count to his portion. Nevertheless, God has not done anything that is ev[il to] them, / rather they to themselves. It is their own deeds th/at shall condemn them and cast them in the gehenna of burning. [10] On the other hand, these who are people of good deeds acc/ord to their goodness. He shall recompense them the goodness, / and give to them the kingdom of lig/h[t], and make them heirs in life eter[n]al. /

Beh[o]ld now, you see God, that [he] too [is a jud]ge. [15] He shall not do what is evil; but rather as he limits the evil, he takes / it away.

(223,17 – 228,4)

/ Concerning the Fifteen Paths; and whether the Ca/techumen would have avoided causing his [20] Wealth to go on the Three Paths to Gehenna. /

In Manichaean teaching each soul, at death, is faced with three possible futures (e.g. see chapter 92): eternal salvation for the elect; eternal damnation for hardened sinners; or rebirth for the catechumens. In this chapter further intricacies become apparent, for there are in fact fifteen possible pathways: four to life; three to hell; and eight to transmigration.

The kephalaion is concerned with a question posed by one of the elect. Given that each soul follows the direction or the pathways of a person's actions in life (their 'wealth'), how can catechumens avoid the damnation caused by their deeds prior to conversion?

Mani's answer evidences a firmly deterministic view of salvation. Each apostle elects his entire church before becoming incarnated in the world, freeing the heavenly forms of each member before they are even born (see also chapter 1). Thus the catechumens are marked out before conversion, and angels waylay their deeds that would otherwise have drawn them to hell, so as to purify them through transmigration. When then the catechumen later converts, these deeds have been cleansed and are ready to travel to the moon, and thus along the path to life, together with the first good deeds resulting from conversion. This is an especial grace (226.10).

In the final section (226.28 – 227.26) Mani uses an extended analogy to show that a persons deeds may precede, accompany, or even follow after an individual soul's own ascent to salvation. As in chapter 86 these teachings appear to be influenced by the Buddhist doctrine of karmic consequences, although thoroughly integrated into Mani's system.

The following chapters are also concerned with transmigration, again evidencing a redaction history to the Kephalaia.

Once again, an elect stood up before the apost/le. He says to him: I beseech you, my master, that you might instru/ct me and persuade my heart about this lesson I would require of you. / For we have heard thus from you: 'Fifteen pat[25]hs are drawn out in the zone. Four paths are pure and belong / [to the] light, leading up to life. Eight other paths are / [mixed], leading above from that place. The light shall go / [u]p and become free through them; be purified and go in / [to the] ships. However, the waste is separated and thrown [30] [dow]n to transmigr[a]tion and the other three paths of / [waste ...] discharged to the gehennas'.

You have explained / [that the three] paths that belong to waste, the ones that are drawn to the gehennas, (224) [a]re drawn from the fleshes. O[n]e of them is the appetite for / [lawl]essness, that of people and of all flesh. The second is the / [...] all bodies, which is slaughter, [with] which / all flesh is consumed. The third is the damaging action*[124], which [5] [...] the Cross of Light and every body; together with the / r[est] of the error and the blasphemy that wounds the gods. /

Th[ese th]ree paths have you taught us, that they lead to the gehennas. / And you have also [told] us that every person shall follow after hi[s] / de[e]ds, whether to life or indeed to death.

Now, I beseech [10] y[ou], my master, that you might speak with me and explain / the lesson of the catechumen. How does his end come o/ut? For from the first, before / he rec[eives] the faith of God, these three paths draw him / on. [The a]ppetite in h[is] bones; the appetite of his fornication; and [15] the damaging action that comes from the wounding. So then, is his / richness drawn (to gehenna)?

From the first, before he becomes a ca/techumen, do these three paths lead to transmig/ration, they of the gehennas? If indeed they are drawn to gehenna. Then, / does he entirely go following after his limbs to bondage? [20] If indeed this will happen thus, as according to me, it is very difficult / for him to live. For there are a multitude of catechume/ns set in the world, walking in err/or and derangement, before they receive the faith of / God. To where will their end come?

[25] Then the apostle speaks to that elect: You have [ask]/ed well for a great lesson! I am the one who will en[li]/ghten you and reveal to you how (it) [is]. /

Now, this is how it is for you to understand (about) the souls of the [ele]/ct and the catechumens that shall receive the hop[e of] [30]

*124 Lit. 'word'. Also 224.15

God and enter the land of the living. / So that their forms could be chosen in the heights: before / he is born in this human flesh and befo[re the a]/postle is manifested in the flesh, still abid[ing ...] (225) he shall choose the forms of his entire church and make th[em] / free, whether of the elect or of the catechume[ns]. / Now, when he chooses the forms of the elect and [the] / catechumens, and makes them free from abov[e], [5] afterwards he shall come down immediately and choose them. /

Now, when he comes and finds them amongst various sects [and] / heresies, he shall choose them by his light word. / And when he chooses them and makes them free from the error of / the sects, even all their deeds that occur in madness [10] come to him through transmigration. Immediately all his / first deeds, that he did before he received the knowledge, shall be freed from every place wherein they are / [bou]nd and snared. They shall loosen their bond and asce/n[d] from heaven and earth, from the trees and the fleshes. / They are loosened from every place wherein they are and go / to the heights with this first fasting and this first prayer; the principal of all his deeds. For it is / the holy sign of his liberation, and cause for / the departure of all his deeds; the former and the latter. /

For his deeds shall not continue outside, awaiting him in e[a]/ch place, until he comes out from the body and frees them al[l] and sends them to the heights. That catechume/n has the ability to free all his deeds / by his own hand, while being in his body. /

Now this matter is like this, the way [som]eone / might dwell at a city, while his enti[re] following [is present] in the cities and the dwellings and the villages [of the country]. (227) As long as, overall, the king is living in t[hat] place, / you shall find his entire host living in those [dwelli]ngs / that surround it. Also, whenever he may [give ... / ...] the sign for departure to the country, when he wishes [...] to it, an indication is given by him to his entire follow[ing] / so that he might set out on the road and depart [...] / each [pl]ace wherein it is. And he goes to the place where it i[s]. /

So, there are some among his expedition who shall travel before / him and be prior to him. And there are others am[ong t]hem who shall wait for him and travel with him. They depart [at] / his departure. Also, there are others among them who / shall come after him, travelling behind him. They continue / [very] many days and months travelling until they arrive. /

His entire following shall not depart a[t] a [15] single time; but someone shall go first / and another after him, while others shall d/epart with him.

This is also what the ca/techumen is like, with his deeds. / There are some among his limbs and his deeds shall be puri[20]fied while he is set in the body. They are cleansed in / [the] firmaments of the heavens and go before him. / [Th]ere are some also among his*[125] limbs shall be freed wi/[t]h him, at the time when he comes out from / [h]is body. There are others shall be freed [25] [af]ter him from the bonds of the earth and that of the creatures. / [They] go and reach him in the land of the living. /

[Behold], I have instructed you about the catechumen / [and ab]out his l[im]bs, about his other deeds that [... / ... b]y him. Nor also will one be lost, (228) [as] the angels hasten [...] He is healed, so that / he [will be ga]thered in, all of him, and go up to the land of the living. / [He] goes and rests himself upon his hope; upon his / good [deed]s that he has done.

/ Also concerning the Catechumen; / shall he be saved in a single Body? /

This chapter is concerned with the religious practices and sins of the catechumens. Normally, catechumens would expect to be reborn, on account of their sins, before they could be saved. As the Manichaean laity they lived within the world, marrying and working; but hoping to accumulate enough merit from their fasts and prayers, and service of the elect through almsgiving, to perhaps become an elect themselves in their next life and thus be saved.

228.8 – 230.30 Mani begins the chapter by explaining that it is possible for catechumens not to need to be reborn; essentially by practising perfection and whole hearted devotion to the church, almost as if they were one of the elect. Such catechumens will receive their final purification during their ascent through the heavens; just as the light in the fruit or vegetables offered to the elect is finally cleansed through their digestive systems.

231.12 – 233.1 Mani then turns to the question of prior sins. Those that believers have committed before entering the church are totally forgiven, so long as they persist in the faith. However, if they return to error they will be punished in respect of all their sins, both from before and afterwards.

233.1 – 234.20 As regards the life of a catechumen: Mani explains that if they carefully observe all their due practices over the religious year, the merit from these will be equal to the sin committed during the remainder of a normal catechumen's year. Furthermore, the catechumen will be absolved of four fifths of the sin by the protection of the church, and by their own faith and gnosis. Nevertheless, they will need to be punished and purified for the remainder. Mani finishes with encouragement for the rewards of the catechumenate; tempered by warnings against back-sliding.

Once again that elect speaks to this apostle: I / heard you, my master, saying that there is a catechum[10]e[n who] shall not enter a body other than this one alone; but wh/e[n] he comes out from his body, his s[oul] shall [... / ...] in the firmaments above, and he travels to the place / of r[es]t.

Now I beseech you, my master, that you might / instruct me about the works of that catechumen [15] who does not enter another body. What are or is / his archetype? Or what is his sign, so that I will und/erstand it and can instruct my other brothers. For they would proclaim i/t to the catechumens, in order that they would be exalted by / that, and ascend in peace to the good.

[20] Then the apostle says to him: I am the one who will instr[u]/ct you about the deeds of those catechumens o/f the faith who do not enter (another) body. The sign of that perfect ca/techumen is this: You shall find the / woman in the house with him, and beside him she is like these strange[rs]. [25] His house, in his reckoning, shall be like these lodg[ing] houses. / He says: I am living in a house for rent by da/ys and months. His brothers and his relativ[es] / shall be, in his reckoning, necessary as foreign people who take up with hi[m], / while travelling on the road with him. He [...] [30] they will separate from him, and each on[e ...] may [...] / the gold and the silver and the utensils of the [...] (229) house. To him, they shall be like borrowed vessels; [he] / takes them, is served by them, and afterwards gives th[em to] / their owner. He does not set his trust on them, nor his tre[asu]re*[126]. / He has withdrawn his consideration from the world and set his [5] he[art] on the holy church. Always his conside[ration] / is placed with God.

Whoever transcends all these things, / in [wh]om there is solicitude and concern and love for the saints, / c[are]s about the church as for h[is] house. / Directly, even more than his house. He has placed all his treasure in the e[l][10]ect men and women. For this is what [the] saviour / put in the mouth of his apostle: From today / on, let these who have wives be like they who do not have them; / these who buy be as if they do not buy; these who rejoice be as if they do not rejoice; / these who weep be as if they do not weep; these who [make] a profit in this world [15] be not in wantonness*[127].

These things that [...] / proclaimed were proclaimed about these perfect catechumens / who shall be released from this one body and go / to the heights. They are like the elect in their constitution. / This is the sign of those catechumens who [20] shall not enter (another) body.

Again, there are others who master / self-control and have even [kept the flesh] of every animal away from / their mouths. They are eager for fasting and prayer each / day; helping the church with what has come into their hands / [i]n alms. The potential for evil-doing is dead within them. [25] [...] that is to say, they set foot in the church more than in / their [ho]use. Their heart is with it at all times. Their sitting down and / [s]ta[nd]ing up is like that of the elect. They have stripped / [a]ll / worldly th[i]n[gs] from their heart. [Now, th]at person, / the Mind that is in the holy church [30] [...] at every [m]oment, and its gifts and / [its ...] and its honours and graces that benefit (230) [h]is life. It steers them to the holy church, / also to these who sh[all] come in to the church, whether / h[i]s children or his wife, or a relative / of his. He shall rejoice over those the more; and love [5] th[em, as] he shall set all his treasure upon them. /

Beho[ld], this is the sign and the archetype of these catechume/ns who shall not enter (another) body. Just like the good pearl, / about which I have written for you in the Treasure of Life / and which is beyond price. This is also how [10] these catechumens are, these catechum/ens who shall not enter (another) body. /

When, however, they come f/orth from their body, they travel on their way and pass by / in the place above, and go in to the life. / They shall be [pu]rified in the heavens, and they are plucked just as a fruit [15] that ripens is plucked from the tree. In just the same way, this al/ms-offering that passes over to the elect is given likeness / in many forms. It is purified and goes in / to the land of the living. Similarly, the soul/s of the catechumens who shall not enter (another) body resemble (the alms).

[20] However, as for the rest of all the catechume/ns, I have written down in the Treasure of Life / how they shall be released and purified; each one of t/hem in accordance with his deeds and his contribution to the chur/ch. This is also how his ascent contribut[es] [25] to him his healing and cleansing. /

Therefore, because of this, it is right for the catechumen to pray at / all times for repentance and the forgiveness of sins from Go/d and the holy church; due to his sins, the [first] / and the last. For his deeds will be collected tog[ether, the] [30] first and the last, and be added to his account.

(231) [Th]en, when his disciples had heard these lessons fro[m him], / they praised him and gave glory to him with great blessings. They / [sa]y to him: Blessed are you, our father, and you are glorious! Bless[ed] / is the hope that awaits us through you, for great is th[is th][5]ing that you have bestowed the souls. Indeed, you have rev[ealed] / to the e[lect] the works and the commandments of the e[lec]t state, / in which they will live. Further, the catechumens / were not abandoned by you. Rather, you have taught them every / step and stair and rung so that they would climb u[10]p by them to the good. Each one of them in accordance with his [potential], and / they attain the country of the living. /

Now, again, we beseech you, our master, that you might continue a/nd recount to us about this lesson that [...] him; and instru/ct us concerning the person who shall [...] [15] and come into the church [...] are elect [and] / catechumens. The first sins that they have committed [in] the wo/rld, before they became disciples, what happens to them? For / some of them worship idols first, making obeisance / and holding in reverence [...] also others among them were firmly [20] set in the teaching of the sects, blaspheming God. / They even profaned the light-givers that are in the heavens. Again, som[e] / of them have committed other sins [... / ... m]urder or a sin committing adultery or [... / a]nd a sin of magic or a [...] of fal[se] witness. [25] [The] other one [...] these in the evil deeds of the wo[rl]d, / if a perso[n] ha[s walked] in them first. Now, when / [someone he]a[rs the w]ord of God, will he be absolved fr[om] / the former [s]ins, or will he [not] be absolved? / There[fore, I entrea]t [you, o]ur master, that you might instruct us [30] [...] and set our heart at rest.

(232) Th[en] the apostle [sa]ys to them: Very great is this less/[o]n [that] you have asked me. I am the one who can reveal it to you / [...] thus. Every person who has received the hope / [and the fa]ith and has separated the light from the darkness, and has perceiv[5]e[d the] mysteries of the living soul, he has received the right hand of pe/a[ce] from the Light Mind who dwells in the holy / church. And he begs forgiveness from the Light Mind. /

Understand this: All his first sins / that he committed from the day that he was born until the [10] [da]y when he received the hope of God, and took his heart a/way from all the sects and idols of error, he / shall be absolved of them all. He shall not be questioned about them from this time, / nor receive retribution on their account. If, this is, he may persist in / his belief and [live. If] he [shall not] sin from this time by these fi[15]rst [s]ins that he committed. Afterwards, he has been taken f/rom [...] he was absolved and he will be made / [...] from this time in respect of all his first sins. /

Should, however, he return to repeat his first deed/s, and sin by them once again, then he will be accounted [20] for all his sins, the former and the latter. He shall receive / retribution for them all, because God had given repentanc/[e] to him and forgiveness for his foolishnesses; but / nevertheless he was not steadfast in this repentance that God had / given him. So, if he had been steadfast in the cate[chu][25]menate, in his faith, and had left behind all his former deed[s], / then he would have been absolved from [all] his sins. / Whether, indeed, an elect in his el[ect state / or] a catechumen in his [cat]ech[ume]/nate. Now, this one who [i]s a catechumen may [stand f][30]irm in the catechumenate. The other si[ns that he] / committed, a multitude [of th]em will be / absolved because of his fasting and his prayer and his alms.

So, listen how I make clear to you / the works of the faithful catechumens. The cat[echu]/men who truly believes performs fifty fasts, wherein [he] / fasts on the fifty lord's days of the y[ear]. [5] Also, he masters their purification, controlling himself [from] / lust for his wife, purifying his bedroom through / self-control on all these lord's days. He shall [...] / in his eating. He shall not defile his nourishment with the [...] / of fish and all the pollution of flesh and blood. H[e shall not e]a[10]t any unclean thing on these lord's days, and [he] also restrains / his hands from wounding and inflicting pain on the living [so]ul. / He keeps to the hours of prayer; he obse[rv]es t/hem and comes daily to prayer. Hour by ho[ur] and / day by day, all these hours of [pra]yer will [...] [15] his fasting, and his alm[s that he] gives o[n] every da/y of the year. [The a]lms wi[ll be coun]ted [...] to / his good, and the fasting that he has performed, and the g[ar]ment that he has put / upon the saints. A daily communion! And they fell/owship with them in their fasting and their g[oo]d. [20] These shall be counted with these other ones, and half of his wo[r]k is done / for the good, the other half for sins.

Still, the sins t/hat he shall commit half the year shall be se/parated into five parts. He shall be absolved from four of them by / [the] protection of the holy church, by the faith [25] [and the] love of the elect. On the one hand because of this, [and] on the othe/[r b]ecause he knows the knowledge and has separated the li/[ght f]rom the darkness, and has offered a hymn and a prayer to / [the l]ight-giver of the heights. Even the quiet that he has m/[ade ...] Now, by cause of these good things t[30][hat he has done, he shall be absolv]ed of four parts, four / [... si]ns that he has committed (234) from the day that he became a catechumen.

As for the rest, / he shall be questioned about a singl[e p]art; and receive / bl[o]ws for (those sins) and retribution. Afterwards he is puri/[fi]ed, whether indeed above or below. He shall be [5] purified according to the worth of h[is] deeds, and clean/sed and washed and adorned. After/[wards], he is sculpted a light image; / and [he glid]es up and reaches the land of rest, so th/at [the pl]ace where his heart is, his treasure also will b[10]e [th]ere. This is, if he shall be steadfast in his catechu/m[en]ate he can receive recompense for his good things like this. /

If, however, he sh[al]l speak a lie and turn from the truth, then / will be [cou]nted all his sin[s] again, the former and / the l[a]tter. The judgement [that con]demns his sins will be poured upon hi[m].

15 Still, i[f he] shall be steadfast in his faith and / bo[l]d in it, then there will be a destiny for him. He asc/ends another time and is made righteous and is released. And he saves / his life in the life for ever and ever. At the time / of h[i]s coming forth, he can go and rest in the life 20 for ever.

When these disciples had heard t/hese lessons of wisdom, they gave glory to their teacher and thought a/bout the first light, the one that brings understanding through the Mind and [the] / riches of its knowledge.

25 The Apostle is asked: Why when / you drew every thing in the Picture (-Book), did you not / draw the Purification of the Catechumens / who shall be cleansed by Transmigration? /

Mani was renowned as a painter, and in his Picture-Book he depicted details of his complex system. Unfortunately, no trace of this work survives. In this chapter a catechumen asks Mani why he has painted the fate of sinners who will be thrown into hell, and of the righteous elect who will ascend to the land of light; but he has not painted the middle way of the catechumens who must pass through transmigration before being saved.

Mani explains that it is because this middle way is various, with the soul of the catechumen passing through all sorts of possible bodies before it is purified. However, he assures the catechumen that the final ascent is the same as that for the elect, which is painted in the Picture-Book.

Once again, at one of the occasions, a cate[chum]e[n ...] 30 stood up. He says to our enlightene[r ...] / Why have you marked every thing [... that ex(235)ists], and what is provided to happen, in the great Picture (-Book)?

You have made / clear in that great Picture (-Book); you have depic[t]ed / the righteous one, how he shall be released and [brou]ght / before the Judge and attain the land of li[ght. You have] [5] also drawn the sinner, how he shall die. [He] shall be [... / s]et before the Judge and tried [...] / the dispenser of justice. And he is thrown into gehenna, where he shall wander / for eternity. Now, both of these have been depicted by you in the [grea]t / Picture (-Book); but why did you not depict [the ca]te[10]chumen? How he shall be released from his bo[dy], and / how he shall be brought before the Judge and [...] reach / the place ordained for him and [...] that he can rest in the / place of rest f[or ever]. For if we can see [...] the path / of the catechumen, and know [...] [15] so have we recognised him with knowledge. If we can also see him / face to face in this Picture (-Book) [...] in the / sighting of him! /

Then speaks the enlightener to t[hat] catechumen. It is not / possible to depict the catechum[e]n in the Picture (-Book), b[20]ecause many [...] world[s] and [...] be/[f]ore him from place to place [...] there are / others existing [...] because [... / to de]pict it, since [... / a]lone in a single place [...] you know [25] [...] that the end of the catechumen [...] / his path comes to be with the elect [...] of the e/[l]ect. Look, he is drawn in the Picture (-Book) [...] as the e/[lec]t will [...] the catechumen will go / [...] the path of the elect [... [30] ... will] not [g]o in to the land of life / [... of the] elect and the catechumen (236) is a single one. However, it is not possible to depict the middle way of the puri/[fication]ion of the catechumen, / because he shall not be purified in a single place; nor / [clean]sed and washed there.

When that [5] catechumen had heard these things he was persuaded and / [agreed] and kept silent.

/ A Catechumen asked the Apo/stle: When I would give an Offer[10]ing to the Saints, shall I inflict a Wound on the Alms? /

This chapter returns to a serious problem for the Manichaeans, the harm and pain caused to the living soul by the very process of saving it. This is the theme of a number of the questions addressed to Mani throughout the

Kephalaia; and the apostle is repeatedly concerned to warn against the consequent tendency to quietism (e.g. see ch. 85)

In this kephalaion the problem concerns the task of providing alms-offerings for the elect, as undertaken by the catechumens. Probably it is the preparation of food that is a principal worry: the plucking of fruit, the baking of bread and so on.

In his answer Mani embarks on a complicated analogy concerning a fight, and then he turns it in to his common theme of the wise doctor who must hurt to heal. While the exact relevance of all players in the analogy is unclear due to the fragmentary text, the basic point is certain. The catechumen must not be afraid of causing sin in the task of preparing and offering alms, for this is an unavoidable process that might cause temporary pain, but will certainly lead to eternal rest and life for the soul trapped in matter. The offering of alms is also a means for the salvation of the catechumen.

Once again, another catechumen questioned the apostle. He tells / him: I know that each time I would provide an alms/-offering for the elect, I know and sense that [...] remainder / [...] of the living soul. A sore and a wound is [15] [...] I awake pain for it in various / form[s ...] / nourishment and their management. Indeed, due to this my heart trembles. / I become very afraid.

I will venture to this place to speak / befo[re] you. Perhaps the good I perform will [20] not repay the sin I am doing to the living soul? /

When the apostl[e] heard these things from / that catechumen, he spoke. He says to him: / Do not be frightened of the sin you will commit that day / to the alms! For al[l] that you do [to] [25] this alms on that day you do to [cause it] / to be healed. You are bringing this alms-offering that you have made to life and r/est.

For this matter is like to two people, if / a personal enemy and an opponent of theirs will hit o/ne first and make a sore and a wound [on] [30] his body. Afterwards he smi[tes him] again and [...] / and he hits over his blows and [...] / blows that have made sores on him and [...] (237) strikes him these two times [...] accuses his [ene]/my who has struck him. And this judge questions him to his face about the [...] / of the sores that he has left as marks on his body. And they [...] / on him as if he had split his head. And he is led to judgement and [sent][5]ence, and is punished before the judge of the worl[d. He] / makes retribution for a sore in the sore place, and adds / to him the wound that he had left on this person who had [not yet s]/inned against him. He shall not omit the retaliation of the opponent, [as] he / is judged [...] according to enmity.

[10] After the end, this enemy is condemned for the retaliation [...] / sin against him. Afterwards, the other one is sick [...] / the one whom this enemy has struck, and a wound comes out [o]n him / [...] and he becomes a sick person by cause of his illness, / and he [...] He calls the doctor and shows him his [15] w[oun]d. However, that doctor has no [...] nor / [...] and he takes the knife to him and cuts this wound. Never[th]eless, / when he cuts i[t] the blood shall pou[r o]ut / of his wound. That person shall be pained, but / he accepts those and these things. This doctor has not retaliated [20] nor was harm imposed on him; because he did this thing / to him for healing his wound. All that he did / to him was done for the good; and not directly for e[v]il. /

After the completion, he cuts this wound and lets blood / [f]rom it and heals it. He shall even make [... [25] ...] gifts and compliments. That illness / [and the] healing become a pride for this doctor, and he is given / [honour].

This is also how this matter of [... / ...] before this living soul. When you make / [an] alms-offering [you] are like this understanding doctor who has [30] [...] he shall heal this ill/[ness ...] strike this alms. At the time (238) [...] it [...] you have struck / [...] it is well and [...] ea/[se] shall [e]xist for it. It is healed by the elect, by the psalms / [and] prayers and ble[ssings]. A glory comes about for this [5] [...] healing [...] it exists [...] it is painful [... / ...] for they shall [t]hank you [...] you. /

Also, [this] is the other person [who] struck the comrade of the [... / ...] sick with his [...] he struck in / [...] he being cruel according to [... [10] ... / ...] living soul [...] upon it [... / ...] that [...] accusation / of [... /

...] [15] like [...] the catechum[en]s / [...] / bec[ome ... / ...] in to the church [...] its / heal[ing], you are wearied [... [20] ... / ... / ...] strips off [a ma]/ss of sins for you [...] only, what you [... / ...] to this alms, the ones that you shall be absolved of [... [25] ...] rather you shall be absolved of other sins that y[ou] / commit through the cleansing and purification [...] / it sh[all] become an intercessor for you and cause yo[u] to be absolved / of a mass of impediments.

Then, when the / catechumen [...] [30] like [...] to the apostle [...] / al[l the] catechumens [... (239) ...] and they perform [...] and make res[t] / and healing for the living soul.

/ Concerning the Purification of these Four Elem[5]ents [that have been place]d in the Flesh. /

Four of the five light elements that descended with the First Man were mixed with darkness and matter. That is: fire, wind, water and light; but not air (see chapter 51). In this kephalaion Mani explains that it is these elements (the living soul), entering by means of food, which are purified in the bodies of the elect. Thus they will attain the land of light. If they do not enter the elect they must continue through transmigration.

However, Mani warns that the pollutions that have been joined to the elements cause dangers for the body. Here he attempts to classify these in four sets of three, linking each of the elements to parts of the body, emotions and states of mind. Thus fire discharges blood, anger, and the humours. Unfortunately, the text for the fourth set is fragmentary, and probably corrupt. The reference to the tree (239.25 ⲡⲱⲏⲛ) is unclear; but the fourth element must be that of wind.

[O]nce again, on one of [the occasions], the apostle is sitting [among the] / congregation. He speaks thus: The four elements [are what is] purified. / From the beginning they are holy ones, living ones, and / enlighteners. However, when they undertood [...] [10] in that first struggle. The waste was [mixed] i/n with them, and the darkness of the enemy was mixed wit/h them. And when they were come in to the body, stri/pping off these polluted garments, they set them in the flesh. / Their pollutions, which they have stripped off, shall be displa[15]yed in a [...] and become a danger to the bo/dy.

The discharge of this pollution, that [the fir]e / shall disgorge and place in the body, is [blo]od. / The discharge of the blood is anger. The discharge of anger is the / humours.

Also, the emissions that the waters discharge [20] from them are lust. The discharge of l/ust is bitterness. The emission of bitterness is f/[e]ver.

The emission that light shall disgorge / is flesh. The emission of flesh is gloom. / [The] emission of gloom is obstinacy.

The emissions [25] that the tree shall disgorge, they are the voices*[128] / of the winds of shame. The emission of winds of shame / [is ...]

The emission of the / [tear] is the [...]*[129] of these twelve emissions. /

[...] these four elements shall [30] [...] what are gathered in (240) are [f]ound by the management of this soul food / [that] enters the body. When they enter / the body, they are cleansed and purified and established / [i]n their living image, which is the new man. They shall live [5] [...] and receive the Light Mind and be purified / in their image; and they come forth, being cleansed and holy. They / attain their first rest.

So, when they shall reach / the elect, this is how they shall be cleansed and go / u[p to] the land of the living ones; but these that come to [10] [...] the sinners and pass through them and [... / ...] in sins. Their end will occur in trans/migration and spirit*[130].

his teaching with the fantastical element of divine and demonic beings populating every corner of the universe. Thus each type of cloud is inhabited by evil rulers that take the relevant opportunity of hail storms or whatever in order to damage the created order. Still, angels are commanded by the Virgin of Light to rush after and seize those rulers, and thus stop them. They are then cast into the seven outer ditches prepared by the light as holding places for the evil forces (see also 116.26 – 33), preparatory to the final destruction of the cosmos.

Mani is thus attempting to explain the constant recurrence of evil in the world, while at the same time asserting the ever-present concern of the light powers and their watchfulness.

In this kephalaion the prominence of the Virgin of Light as having authority over the zone (244.12) is noticeable, for this role is elsewhere taken by her masculine doublet the Third Ambassador (e.g. 82.18).

Once again, the apostle is sitting in the congregation of his d[i]/sciples. The heavens were cloudy that day. / He brought his eyes up and saw the cloud that day. / He says to his disciples: This cloud that is app[20]arent to you, which you see; I will reveal / and teach you about it, how it ascended! /

Happen you know that it shall be released fr[om] / five places and ascend over this great earth and [...] / and it is revealed and seen in the atmosphere between.

[25] So, the cloud shall ascend from fire [to] / the heavens towards the likeness of the Virgin of Lig[ht] tha[t] / she shall display to it. Its sign is the flas[hes that] / occur with lightning storms [... i]ts exchan[ge ...] / And they shall be purified by her towards [...] [30] the light that she shall reveal [... (241) ...] the rulers shall be released by the lightning storms and they are f[re]/ed and sent.

However, [these] angels shall immediately be summoned to them. / So that they will seize them, because they kn[ow] / that they shall never do good. Every place they will tou[ch] [5] they shall make dead and a loss. Whenever / the angels will make towards them and come beside [...] / they shall flee in their constraint before them. They go i[n to] / whatever they will meet upon and assume it. Like [a] ro/bber being abandoned and fleeing before one stronger than hi[m], as he [10] runs after him to arrest him.

Now, those rulers / that shall be freed from these clouds and assume wh/atever they will meet upon [...] in to the [... / ...] that they did not [...] will seize / this thing, whether indeed a [tr]ee to [which] they have found the way or animals or people. Si/mply, every place that they will assume they shall burn a/nd destroy by the fire of their body. Namely, the rulers, [the] chil/dren of fire, they that shall be stripped of the fire. /

In contrast, [the] cloud that shall be raised up from water, and comes above towards the Virgin of Li/ght; its sign is the thunder storms and the booms that / shall come in the atmosphere in various forms and are he[ar]d. / [...] Again, there are times if the rulers that belong / [to t]hem, which exist in the cloud, shall on occasion be constrained [in a] water [clou]d. And they flee from it and aband[on] it. /

Now, [they] too are so, in that every place th[ey wi]ll / [reach], they shall make frost and hail and s[no]w. / [They rui]n the seed-corn and the fruits and the plants; and they / [...] every [pl]ace [that] they will reach.

Again, [ang]els shall be summoned to them who seize them. Still, while the angels (242) [ru]sh after them in order to seize them, they shall make this destruction. /

Also, [the cl]oud that will be raised up from wind / ascends to the atmosphere between, towards the likeness of the Vi[r/g]in that she shall display to it. Its sign is [the s]torm wind that shall blow with bitterness. /

So, i[n] those winds and tempests shall the lives / be p[ur]ified. Again, the rulers will be stripped of the clo/ud of wind and they descend from it, safe in / the[ir] image. All the rivers and the seas that they will reach and arrive at, they shall make waves in them a/nd raise [...] and they [...] the ships. They / wreak destruct[ion ...] and they seize / and bring them [...] /

Also the cloud, the one of light, immediately they will be strip[ped] of it [... / ...] the Virgin. She shall / display its sign too [...] And its sign is / this, in that you shall find it sailing in stillness and calm. / The lives in it shall be clea[nsed] in stillness and calm. Again, the rulers that will be stripped of it [...] / that will come forth [...] they shall put [...] and they take [... / ...] there [...] the [a]nge[ls] / seize them.

Again, the cloud that shall be raised [up] / fro[m] the mingled air comes above towards [the image] [25] of the Virgin. Its sign is this, in that [...] / are pur[if]ied in it in stillness and [rest ... these rulers] / that will be stripped of that cloud and [co]me f/rom it; every place that they will find [...] / they shall make it {}*131 [...] [30] one of [...] unt[i]l [... (243) th]ey are seized and taken to their midst.

Their stri[p/p]ings, that they shall leave behind them in various places / they will have reached, whether the produce of the trees or the offspring [of] / the fleshes, they shall be taken midst [...] wither away. [5] They shall inflict great dangers, but agai[n] / those rulers also the angels shall s[e]/nd to their midst. They bring the light from them and / cast the demons down to these seven o[ut]er ditches / of the great sea; which i[s] the vessel of [10] the waters that are outside the wo[rl]d. /

Then his disciples say to him: Instruct us, / our master. To what place do those seven ditches go / down?

[The apostle] says [to t]hem: / Those ditches and the [...] unt[15]il they reach the earths below [...] fe/et of the Porter.

Hear also [...] / for sometimes these angels shall be sent to them, / to seize the rulers. Whenever the rulers [... / ...] for the angels rush after them. They beseech them [...] [20] they that are given the command. However, [t]hose [rul]ers / shall be freed from them alone and ass[um]e / [...] and [the fle]sh. They are consumed by this offspring [... / ...] tree and that of flesh. The angels shall set a / [... ov]er them, that they might guard them until the hour when [25] [those r]ulers will be stripped of tree and / [flesh; a]nd they go [u]p above. They shall be gathered / [...] above, and they are poured out / [...] in their first for/[ms ... im]ages in which they first were. (244) They take the light from them, which had remained behind in [t/h]em. And they too are cast down to these seve[n] / outer [path]s that are in the great sea; the place to where these former ones [were c/as]t. They shall reach their mids[t [5] ...] and the light that is in them is taken. /

Beh[old] n[o]w, I have instructed you about this cloud: How / it shall ascend above, and the lives that are in it / are purified. / The Three Earths that ex/ist, they bear Fruit. /

Mani uses the example of human farmers upon the earth to describe the work of the sun and moon in cultivating the field of the living soul, and the Light Mind toiling over the holy church, to bring them to harvest. He then calls upon his audience to be active in the faith, to do the farming of righteousness, and thus to bring forth fruit.

On[ce] again he speaks to his disciples: Thr[ee earths] 25 exist in the universe, and are being toiled over. At first they [... / ...] the farmer in them. Afterwards they bear [good] fruit / to they who toil over them.

/ Concerning the Three Creations of the Flesh: the ones / that were brought forth [...]; and the ones [10] that were begotten by the Abortions; and the ones / that were formed of themselves. /

This chapter shows again how Mani presented his teaching as an integrated science for understanding the entire world. Life arises from the mixed light and dross that fell to earth at the time when the Ambassador displayed his image in the heavens, and the demonic powers ejaculated or aborted in their lust. This matter or sin contained the 'thought' (ἐνθύμησις) or driving force that causes reproduction. Here Mani attempts to classify the different forms of plant life according to various means of propagation.

On[ce again] our enlightener speaks to his disciples: All these / animals that you see, and also the rest of the [crea]/tur[es ...] of the earth, confirm them in three [15] likeness[es ...] them from [... / ...] abortions. Others, / [however, for]m their own selves in their shape [... / ...] Also, their nourishment is thre[e / ... li]ght in them, if they shall wish [... [20] ... / ...] they eat see[ds and] fr[uit / ...] they eat seeds and fruit. / The [...] it entirely, and they [... / ...] the three archetyp[es] from their nature and the [... [25] ...] the time when they are on the ea[rth ... / ... th]ey are seized [...] / in their [... / ...] the Ambassador [... / ...] all powers [... [30] ... / ...] / i[n] it [... / ...] first [...] (247) plant them [g]enerally to this name: shoots and grass. It formed / the bad, bitter tre[es], the reeds and the thorns and the [...] / and these others that are like them.

For that th[oug]/ht belongs to the flesh-eating rulers. [St]ill, these [that were] [5] planted (belong to) grass and gourds, since they are in their essence. Nevertheless, [this t]/ho[ugh]t that came down from the rulers, [a]/s they are i[n] fruit and grass first and shall not be planted / in flesh and blood, it formed the trees that shall give nourishing [fru]/it as their gourds are sweet.

Again, this thou[ght] [10] that came down from the powers that eat m[ea]t / and also eat grass and gourds, it has formed the trees / that shall not produce any nourishment. Their / fruits belong neither to good nor evil. /

Behold, I have taught you the growth of the tree. For it was [15] planted from the sin that came down from the [powe]rs of / [...] according to the counsel and teaching of the [...] / them due to them. It grew the tree on the earth and gave fr/u[its] there of different kinds and shapes. /

Furthermore, I also reveal to you another thing about these trees [20] that shall be cut and grow again upon their roo/t; and they produce fruit. There are also others that if they are cut / shall neither grow nor produce fruit. And there are others / if their branches shall be [cu]t they are planted. There are some / [...] and they make fruit and come up and make a tre[e]. And it [25] [produces a bra]nch.

Now these (trees) that shall be cut from / [their] root and flourish and blossom an[ew and / produce] fruit, [t]heir thought is in [their / reproductive pa]rt*[134] and the[ir ro]ot. Again, due to this they shall [... / ...] a firmness exists [... [30] ...]

Howev[er], the other trees [that (248) shall be] cut and not grow by their root and repro[ductive / part], their thought that sculpts them / [i]s (in their) twigs. And these others too, from which / branches shall be taken and planted and they sprout, their th[5]ought that sculpts them is in their body / [and subs]tance, as their thought exists in buds [th]at a/[re] in their branches. Also, these others, which shall grow from / the [fr]uits and the seed, their counsel is in their / [fr]uit. Due to this they shall be formed and grow from their [10] [fr]uit.

/ What is Virginal; or, / otherwise, what is Continent? /

Mani applies these two terms at five successive levels of the light's descent into matter. The archetypal distinction is between the light that remains in the eternal kingdom, which is virginal; compared to that which has entered into time and mixture. Then, at descending levels, the other pairs are as follows: the gods in time who do not enter mixture compared with the light that does; the light first purified through the episode when the Ambassador displayed his image, and the light that had to continue through transmigration; the Light Mind and the new man; a human virgin and a person who renounces sex.

Once more, the apostle is sitting down one time among / the congregation of his church. He says to his disciples: 15 W[h]at is the virgin that is named 'virginal'? / Or the [one that] is called 'continent', what is it? Or by what category is / the [vi]rgin called 'virginal'? Or [the co]/ntinent, which is given this name, by what category is it / named '[c]ontinent'?

20 His disciples say to him: Proclaim to us, my master, of these / [t]wo lessons; since all good gifts are given to us through you. /

Then speaks our enlightener to them: / What is called 'virginal' is assigned to the myster/y of the aeons of greatness. And they called it 'virgi25n[a]l' by the category of all the light that did not [taste] / of death, nor come to the enemy's war. / However, what is called 'continent' oc[curs to / the m]ystery of the light that came and was mixe[d with the / dark]ness. It was defiled in bodies [... 30 ...] and went up to the light. [They] called [it 'co/ntine]nt'.

Furthermore, the holy vir[gin]als [... / ...] should they come out against the en[emy ... / ... not] taste death, nor [...] (249) On the other hand, what is called 'continent' [is this li]/ght that mixed with the darkness, was purif[ie]d, came [up f]/rom all the creatures, and was confirmed in the great[ness]. / They called it 'continent' since it tasted [of the l]5ust; but afterwards was cleansed from it and [become an] / holy one.

Furthermore, what is called / ['vi]rginal' is this light that was purified by the ima[ge] of / the [A]mbassador. It wen[t up and] attained [the] he[ights. It was] / confirmed in the image of the gods. Again, what is [called] 10 'continent' is the remainder of this light th[at] / remained behind, from what was cleansed. It goes up [and comes] / down in transmigration. Al[so], there is a part [of] i/t that shall come and attain the form of [hum]an [fl]esh. / Again, that one too shall be chosen in the flesh, [accept] the ho15pe, and become an holy one. And they name it 'continent'. /

Furthermore, what is named 'virginal' is the Light Mind, / should he come and assume the images [of] the ele/ct. However, on the other hand, what is called 'contin[ent]' is / the new man, should it be purified from this old man. And it [20] is cleansed and strips off the sin that is compounded with it, and it becomes / a continent one.

And also, what is called 'virgi/nal' in the flesh, is a man if he has [ne]ver joined himself to woman, / has not been defiled by intercourse. However, [i]n contrast, what is called / 'continent', is the man who has a wom[25]an in the world. Afterwards, he cleanses himself from her / [and] renounces her. And because of this he [...] and he becomes an holy / contin[en]t one.

Behold, I have taught you the categories / [of] the v[ir]ginal and the continent in a great many / [as]pects. For what is virginal, or otherwise what is [30] [con]tinent, is in many forms.

/ Concerning Transmigration. /

Mani explains that although both sinners and catechumens must pass into transmigration, the fate of these two categories differs. He compares this to the educative punishment that must on occasion be meted out to erring children, contrasted with that imposed on wicked servants. Thus the catechumens will in the end attain to the light and the life, while sinners will be imprisoned and suffer eternal death.

[O]nce again o]ne of the catechumens questioned the apost/[le. He says] to him: We have heard a lesson from you, my master. (250) You [have] recount[ed it] fo[r] us and written it down in the books, as you [... / ...] people who come out from their body / [are d]riven into transmigration and wandering, and / [ea]ch one is weighed [according to] his actions. Whether the sinners, you [5] [proclaimed] to us that they are driven into transmigration / [... or] they who have received the faith and have / [...] in the [... dr]iven also into tr/[ansmigrat]ion [... / ...] the catechumens surpass the sinn[10] [er]s [...] and again he too is driven into transmig/ration and t[ak]es hope. /

Then the lord [spea]ks. He told them about these two lessons. [... / ...] one concerning the transmigration of the sin/n[er]; he speaks to them about the transmigration of the cate[15]chumen.

/ Concerning the Dragon with Fourte[en] He[ads]; / what it is and [...] /

Many Manichaean texts describe the human body as a microcosmos full of warring demons. Interestingly, here Mani asserts that this is a spiritual but not a physical truth. He proceeds to relate the fourteen headed dragon in the body, with its five refuges, to different parts of the anatomy. The dragon is really the driving force or 'thought' of the body that the righteous person must overcome, so as to receive the victory.

[Once again], one of h[is] disciples asked the [apostle ... [30] ...] is distributed [... / ... / ... (252) the] laws of the Magi. They say that there is / [a d]ragon with fourteen heads, and it is gathered / [i]n and [...] den with five refuges. Now, I beseech / [y]ou, my master, that you may instruct me about this lesson. [5] [Wh]at really is a corporeal dragon wi[th] / fourteen heads? Or is it another spiritual lesson? /

Then the apostle says t[o] him: / [The]re is [n]ever a dragon [i]n the f[l]esh with fourtee[n] hea[ds], / as the Magi say! Rather, this is a [spiri[10]tual les]son. It was uttered in virgini[ty / ...] the Magi did not understand [... / ...] all their words that are written [... / ... spiri]tual (?).

Again, this is how this earth / [...] to it, as it is accounted a co[rp]ore[al] drag[on [15] ...] I will instruct you / [...] the dragon is this doctrine [... / ...] of the flesh [... / ...] also the f[ou]rtee[n] heads that are distributed ove[r] / the d[ragon] are these.

The seven sense organs [o][20]n [the h]ead of the body are the two of sight by whi[ch one] / se[es; the] two of sound b[y] which one hears; / [the] two of scent by which one smells; also the to[ng/ue ...] by [which] one selects, receiving / [th]ere the different tastes that occur in every form.

[25] [These ar]e the seven heads of the dragon, the seven sen/[se] organs that are on the upper part of the person; [... / ...] below. The seven of the [tor/so] are these: two [...]; the two [... / ...] ruler [... [30]

... / ... the se]ven [heads that are (253) a]bove; so with the ones below they total and make fou[rteen] / heads of the dragon.

Conversely, the five dens about which they have [spo/k]en, where the dragon is congregated and protrudes, / are these: the first is the tong[ue]; [5] the second is the lungs; the third is the h[eart]; / the fourth is the spleen; the fifth is the b[lood that] / dwells in them. Again, if it shall look out from them [and / r]eveal its likeness and its observation a[bo/v]e and below, it wages war [by [10] i]ts fourteen heads.

Whoever will recognise them [wi]th / the dragon, which is the thought of [the b]o/dy, and struggles with it and is victorious and ki[lls] i/[t] in them [... he is called] / the holy righteous one, elect, good person. [15] He receives the victory without suffering on the day [of h]is com/[in]g forth.

So, behold, I have taught you of the dragon that / [exi]sts with its fourteen heads and five dens, / [wh]erein it is concealed and hidden. It does through them [... / its des]ire all the time.

Then th[a]t disciple says [20] to him: My heart has been persuaded, my master, by what [you have r]e/[count]ed to me. You have taught me of the dragon with the fourteen / [he]ads. Blessed is every one who will slay and kill it; / [and it suffers] loss! He will live for ever and be a person victori[ous / i]n all his deeds.

/ [Concer]ning why, if the Person shall look down / into Water, [...] /

This chapter illustrates again Mani's fascination with all aspects of the natural world; and his attempt to create a totally integrated science.

254.1 – 24 Reflection in water is explained as a spiritual mystery signifying the descent of the divine call to the First Man in the abyss, and the corresponding ascent of the answer to the Living Spirit.

254.24 – 255.7 Reflection in water is explained as a physical mystery indicating how humans and other life on earth are inextricably tied to the stars and zodiacal signs (their 'fathers').

255.7 – 11 Reflection also indicates that a child is born head first.

255.12 – 21 Shadows show how the body is fastened to the earth.

This series of loosely grouped teachings may evidence textual development. Also the distinction between spiritual and physical truths, occuring also in the previous kephalaion, may be the link used by the redactor in attempting to order the chapters.

[Once again, one of his d]isciples asked the apostle / [... ... in(254)stru]ct me about this lesson: When / the person is above water and looking down [into / the wat]ers, if he shall see his face reflected why sh/all you find his head turned upside down and a[l]so his fee[t] upwards? Yet, when he stares down into the wa[te/rs], his face shall not be visible, nor can he see i[t / th]ere? Then the apostle says to him: Ha[p/pen] you know this, that this universe is established / [of m]ystery, and is entirely full of mystery. [And] this: The face of people and the shape of trees shall app[ear] / turned upside down in the water as this is signifi[ed] / in [the] mystery of the summons, when it was sent do[wn] / to the [wo]rlds of darkness towards the First Man. Sin[ce / ...] in this way it cast itself down [...] like a person [who] plunges headlo[ng] into water; / so it is also with the summons. It cast itse[lf] / headlong to the worlds below, with streng[th] / and diligence.

And this too: Shall the pe[rs]/on lift his head up from the water, his face shall not be visibl[e] to him, being bent below. This characterises the m[yste]/ry of the obedience that ascended from below, / from with the First Man his father to the [Liv]ing Spirit. / This is a spiritual mystery that I have [revea]/led to you so that you would understand it.

I[f] you [w]ish to understand another cor[pore]al mystery / on this subject, listen and I may teach you to under[stand it]. / The face of people and of animals [and / of] trees is visible in the water, hangi[ng upside down]. / This occurs to the mystery of the [stars] and the zodiac, which hang upside down and are vis[ible in] / the great sea. For the face of people and beasts and all trees hang on the ro[ot] / of the stars and the zodiac, being begotten from them. / Just as their fathers, who are spread out above, [hang] / upside down; so it is also that the m[yste]ry of their fathers is being revealed to them whenever th[ey sta]re down into the water. This is, that you shall find their [shapes] / inverted.

Not only this, but [the] child / who is born; as the ho[ur] approaches for him to be born*[135], he hangs upside down and is born [he]ad first. [10] Indeed, due to this, his mystery shall be revealed / in these waters people [s]tare down [int]o. /

Furthermore, I reveal something else to you: Behold, you will find the shadow of the person who walks along is joined to the earth / all the time. If the person is troubled [...] [15] his shadow up upon the earth [...] / above. It is impossible for him to do [... / ...] on the earth. See, this mystery is [a] great / sign, signifying that the entire body came / from the earth and had ascended from the abyss. Again, d[u]e to this, [20] its shadow is joined on the earth, turned downwar[ds], / and hanging from above.

/ Concerning the Light Mind, why / it does not exercise Forekno[25]wledge for the Saint as for the Apostle? /

Mani is asked why the Light Mind does not cause the elect to have perfect and prior knowledge, such as the apostles have, when it indwells them all. He gives five practical reasons why such knowledge could lead to abuse and dissension; but promises that it will be given to them when they ascend from their bodies in perfection.

[O]nc]e again one of the elect questioned the apostle, saying / to him: The Light Mind that shall come and be reve/[aled] of the holy church, and assumes the faithful / [and the ele]ct; why shall it not entrust forekno[w[30]ledge] to them [as for] the apostle? In my opinion, it ought to be unve/[iled] to them in a revelation. Just as / [all things are revea]led for the apostle, so also / [ought they] to be unveiled for the elect and they become 'fore/-[knowers]'; so that they will attain them, be they easy or (256) difficult. You ought to find them, knowing each other's heart; / because the child of the apostle is the Mind. For whoever / [und]erstands i[t] is able to unveil all things from it, / [just a]s with the apostle!

*135 Lit: he is about to be born and his hour comes.

Then the apostle says to [5] [him]: You have recounted this well. I am the one who will te/[ach y]ou about it. Happen you know that the Light M[ind], / who dwells in the elect, has the power to perform all these / w[onders] among the faithful, all these signs that you have re/co[unted] to me; but the elect are not able to persist in [10] the great[ness] that may be unveiled to them.

Not only this, but / [firs]t of all: If it unveiled something to / the [ele]ct and they exercised foreknowledge, they would have become an apostle / and none be humble to his comrade.

Second: / [If t]hey were knowing each other's heart, they would have despised [15] one another. If their counsel and consideration / is unveiled from one [to] another, and the shames of th[eir] / body are revealed to each other, not one among them / [...] the other.

Third: They would have made enemies of / one another because of the counsels and evil considerations t[20]hat they shall ponder over together; due to the flesh that / they assume and the sin that dwells in them. An[d] when / each one of them will understand the evi[l] counsel / that his comrade ponders over, he may become an enemy / to him immediately; and they are set firm against one another [25] in disputation.

Fourth: When / he may exercise foreknowledge, they will understand the lifespan [... / ... of] a body and will not await a gr[eat many] / years in righteousness, but [...] / down to the world. And when they will [...] [30] attain the one found be enlightened [...] / up to righteousness.

Fifth: [If] / everything is unveiled to them, th[ey would have] unveiled it to the magicians in the world and these fortune-tellers, and go arou[nd fr]/om place to place taking money to create for them wealth and worldly [ri]/ches.

Now this is why (the Light Mind) shall not give a reve[la]/tion to the elect. It does not add it to them due to these five [thin]gs; [5] but the matter is hidden from them only until the time when [they will come] / forth from their body.

Then every thing that has oc[curred] / and that will occur is unveiled to them!

Food engenders five productions from the human body. These five may all be understood as physical, if the text is read as euphemistic. For instance: spiritual heat; spittle; sweat; semen and sexual juices; children.

[O]nc]e again he speaks to his disciples: This sustenance / of various kinds that people gather in / and eat, and enters the body; it shall be distributed [10] to five productions.

The first product is this that shall / issue from the person in rapture and rises up in / the Mind, and it comes out from all his limbs, and is immeasurable. /

25 There is no Joy that shall remain / in the World till the End. /

Although they are not themselves oppressed, the sun and the moon (here personified) can never be completely joyful during the time of mixture. This is firstly because they see the rule of the enemy in the universe; and secondly they see the oppression of the living soul everywhere before it reaches them and is finally cleansed.

[O nce agai]n he speaks to his disciples: There is not [o]ne person / [existing in] the world, standing firm [i]n mixture, for whom / [j]oy remains to the end.

Not only peo[30][ple], even the sun and the moon, the light-givers of the heavens / [...] nor are they oppressed, they know not / [... s]et firm in a summons and an (260) [obe]dience. Nevertheless, they too, they do not rejoice comple/[tel]y.

15 Concerning the Seed Grain that shall be / formed by the Elements, [a]/nd also be destroyed by them. /

The meaning of this chapter is not entirely clear. Perhaps the theme is that there is a cycle of growth and blight, and that one must inevitably lead to the other in this world of mixture. As the light elements are saved, so what is left must be increasingly stricken.

Once again [the] apostle, the builder of the church, spea[ks] to his disciples: / This seed grain and this barley grain 20 that you see shall be formed and [...] a/nd beautified by the five elements. [N]ow, the w[ar]mth / and the cold nourish the seed grain and the / entire [t]ree. So, just as these things nourish it [... / ...] it is destroyed [...] throu[g]h 25 [... / ...] hunger.

In this way also righteousness / [gathe]rs the five to it. / Concerning the Fifty Lord's Days; / to what Mysteries do they correspond? Or the / Second (Fifty)[139]; to whose Sign (are they)? /*

Mani is asked to explain the significance of the fifty fasts undertaken by the catechumens, that is once weekly on each lord's day; and also of a further fifty held by the elect. He engages in some rather convoluted calculations to reach these totals.

The first fifty correspond to the mystery of the First Man: five powers for each of his five sons or garments equals twenty-five limbs of the living soul. This divine son/s of the Man (note the deliberate Christological reference) has abstained from the food of life in a world of mixture. The doubling of the twenty-five seems (263.4 – 9?) to be calculated with reference to the ascent of the First Man; and then the ascent of the call and answer, which are the counsel of life or means of salvation for the soul.

The second fifty correspond to the mystery of Jesus as the second man: forty days fasting in the desert, seven days in the house of Simon the leper, and three in the tomb.

Once [again] a disciple stood up. He questions the apo[15]stl[e], saying to him: I beseech you, my m[a]/ster, t[o] recount to us about the fifty lord's days during wh/ich the catechumens fast. For what do they fast, or / for whose mystery do they fa[s]t? Or these seco[20]nd (fifty) that is set between the elect, / to whose mystery were they set [a]mongst them? Proclaim t[hi]s also to / [us] and persuade us about it, because [... / ...] you [...]

Then [he] say[s to] / his questioner and they with him: [25] Happen you know that [in eac]h one of these five garments that the [First] / Man summonsed there are five powers. / They shall be counted to the [... each] / other, these five, and five times [...] / their number. However, at the time [...] (263) the summons went down. The answer wis[h]/ed to ascend with it. And the summons with the obedien[ce constitute] twenty-five characteristics in their twenty-five limbs, [which] / are the sons of the Man. The summons and [the obed][5]ience were raised to the heights through them.

[*139] Smagina 1990:122 suggests that the term δευτέρα stands for Monday, i.e. the second day of the week upon which the elect fasted.

Just as their fa[ther] / the living Man raised himself up through them, by th[ese] / these other ones have set up all things a[bov]e / and below. / The Human is less than all the Things [5] of the Universe, and he is rebellious beyond them all. /

This kephalaion seems to begin with a clear historical reminiscence. In the latter part there are two typical catechetical lists that appear to have been added to the text.

266.6 – 267.18 Mani stands in a dry river-bed and points to a great mountain, in order to illustrate his theme. The sense of his comments seems to be that if all of mankind (or perhaps all life forms?) were gathered together they would not equal in size this one mountain, and similarly they would be engulfed (?) in a single sea. And the earth has many mountains and seas existing in silence and peace. Nevertheless, it is humanity that blasphemes against God in all his power, saying that God is the one who created the demonic beings.

267.18 – 268.2 A disciple interprets this attack upon monotheism (correctly) as an assertion that humanity does not belong to God. He therefore asks why Jesus the son of God came into the world, and had to suffer torment and persecution. Mani replies that Jesus did not come to save mankind alone. He had various tasks in the divine plan, including a cosmological role (e.g. 94.1 – 11) and his revelation to Adam and Eve.

268.3 – 18 Jesus sent the apostles and revealed five great things.

268.19 – 27 The faithful shall live by three mighty things.

[F]urthermor]e, it happened one time as the apostle is travelling / [on the] road. He came across a great river marked deep in it[s / be]d. That river was dry. When he had le[apt o]/ut, he stood in its midst and filled [his] eyes [10] [with its brea]dth and length and deep bed [... / ...] he lifted his eyes up and saw a great mo[untain] / beyond that river.

After he had stood / [in] that place in the midst of the river, he shook his [head]. / He [sa]ys: If one of all these five wo[rlds [15] of the f]lesh [...] today on the surfaces of the earth [... / ...] out from [...] which is deep. [They / re]count no cause of evil after Go/[d].

However, [the i]dol of ill-fated human[it]y [... / ...] the one that will be unlike anything, that is equal [... / ...] great works; and it was found evil [by] [10] God, the Lord of all. It even blasphemed again[st the] / power that supports the totality, against its hol[y] light; [and / it] profaned its glorious wisdom, bringing forth / the cause of every sin. They say that / every disgraceful wickedness and defilement, the rulers and the [15] demons and the fiends and the satans, they say that they have co/me from God, that he is the one who [es]tablished them [... / ...] they came not from him, and they give false testimony / about him.

Then, when he had recounted this, / at that instant one of his disciples speaks [20] to him from amongst these who are standing before him: T[e]ll / [u]s, our master, and instruct us about this lesso[n]. /

Now, [i]f this idol of humanity does not belong [t]o / God, according to what you have said about it, why did Jesus come to / [the] world, the son of the Living God? He has been reve[al[25]e]d therein! He suffered tribulation and persecution. They hung h/[im] on the cross, and his enemies perpetrated against him the tor/[ment] and shame of their evil-doing. /

[The ap]ostle [says] to him: Jesus did not come and s[a/ve the] world because of mankind alone, but [30] [... he] came and revealed on earth / [...] was strong outside in / [...] And [whe]n he had finished doing his (268) [t]ask outside [i]n the great u[ni]verse, he came [... / he wen]t further with Adam and Eve and revealed [to them]. / Even so, he sent the apostles to the good, / [g]eneration by generation, and revealed to them five great thin[gs].

[5] [Firs]t: He told them that they belong to the race of ligh[t. /

Se]cond: He unveiled to them about the aeons [of the gre/atness], how they occur; and he taught them about [the / manner of] the darkness, how it t[o]o exists. /

[The th]ird time: He proclaimed to them about the [l]ight great-[ness], [10] how it has been active against the pow[er / of] darkness and conquered it. /

Fourth: He taught them that he came to the province of death [... / ...] that is flesh, until he should find profit and bring / them from the gate of the underworld below, for [they had] been swa[ll][15]owed into it.

Fifth: He explained to us / that the rebels shall be bound in a great fetter, they who / shall [r]ebel against the g[o]od and against the righteousness t/hat is proclaimed by the apostle. /

Once [again] the apostle speaks: All the faithful who believe [20] this tr[u]th shall live by three great mighty things. /

/ The Chapter on whether any [Lig]/ht comes from the Three Vessels.

Mani taught that the universe was layered, with eight earths and ten heavens, and carefully constructed for the purification of the light. The term 'vessel (ⲙⲁⲛⲍⲓⲟⲣⲉ)' is variously used in this complex cosmology. However, the reference to such surrounding the universe would seem to indicate the three vessels of water and darkness and fire that the Living Spirit first poured down from the heavens, and that he then swept out to ditches prepared for them at the edge of the universe. See chapters 42 – 45, especially 112.20 – 24. In any case, this kephalaion explains the mechanism by which light may be further refined, even from these vessels.

[30] Once again the disciples questioned our enlightener. They say: [Preac]/h about this bit of life and light that comes from [these three] / vessels that surround the universe [...] / life comes up [...] /

15 Concerning the Three Images that / are in the righteous Person. /

The elect have three 'images (εἰκών)' in them: the corporeal; the psychic; and the spiritual, which is the new man formed by the Light Mind. The living soul that enters the elect through food is cleansed as it rises up through these three, being stripped of all the corporeal and then the psychic accretions brought by mixture. In the spiritual image the light virgin perfects it.

This latter term is used variously in Manichaean texts. Here she is described as a guide, just as is the eschatological Light Form who comes to greet the departing soul with her three angels carrying the victory prizes. However, in this context she represents the perfection of the elect soul. Essentially the virgin is the manifestation of the soul in all her chastity and power.

Once again our enlightener speaks to his disciples: Thr/[ee] images occur in the elect person. /

[The fi]rst is the [s]piritual image, which is the new man, wh20ich the Light Mind shall form in him; and it goes [i]n / to him and dwells in him.

The second image is [the] rem/nant and remainder of the new man, which is the py[ch]ic image / that is bound in the flesh, as the old man [... si]nce the / times of this psychic image.

The other one is the [corp]oreal image 25 [that is] added to them all.

These three images / [...] entirely. When it will [... / ...] through the nourishment of food. If it shall sink [... / ...] down to the corporeal image. [And] the corporeal, / [that] is in it, shall divest itself of it and place it in the [...] image. 30 [...] again it rises up and falls to the [...] image; / it [sh]all divest itself of the psychical of the enemies, which [... / ...] anger. The lust [... / ... / ...] with it.

Then sh[all] a [light] vir35[gin come and] reveal [the] spiritual image (270) that is [there], which [is] the n[ew m]an. / T[h]at virgin acts as a guide. [She g]/oes on before and it is extended to the heights abo[ve, / and] received in to this spiritual image. And she scu[lpt[5]s] it and adorns it with the new man [wi]t/[hi]n. It is sealed with all the limbs of this light vir/[gin] who is present and dwells in the new man. /

So, this is [h]ow this living limb shall be [puri/fied] and live, the one that comes in to the body of [10] [the ri]ghteous one from without through the administration of food of various ki/[nds], like this. The living soul shall be clea/n[sed] entirely every [d]ay and traverse these three [im]/a[ges]*[145].

So, it shall divest itself of the body, which is not its own, / in the corporeal. It shall also divest itself of the souls [15] that are not its own, these that are mixed with it in the psychical [... / ...] anger and desire and [...]-ness / and foolishness and envy and strife; and these other / wicked teachings that are not its own.

However, in [the] / spiritual image itsel[f] it shall live and be joined with [lo][20]ng-sufferingness, the perfection of faith and love / that reigns over them all. It is the virgin of / light who robes the new man and who shall be cal[l]/ed 'the hour of life'. S[he] is the f[irst], / but s[h]e is also the last.

/ The Catechumen asks / the Apostle: will Rest / come about for Someone who has come out of the Body, i/f the Saints pray [over] [30] and make an Alms-offering [for him]? /

In this extensive chapter the question concerns the effectiveness of prayer for the dead; and how to reconcile such intercession with the doctrine of retribution for one's sins (the familiar theme of grace versus deeds). Whilst this second problem is not clearly answered in the readable portions of the text, the chapter is of particular interest for evidencing (albeit only implicitly) Manichaean practices as regarding the dead; and the role of the elect or the saints within believing communities.

270.31 – 271.12 Framing sequence and statement of the catechumen's question.

*145 Reading ⲛ[ⲉⲓ]/ⲕ[ⲱⲛ]

271.13 – 26 Mani replies that supplications made by the elect in faith will be granted; for such petitions have been made by the gods since the beginning, and the right has been passed on to the church.

271.26 – 273.9 Mani explains the archetypal supplication whereby the Mother of Life besought the Father for a helper, on behalf of the First Man; and was granted the Living Spirit that saved him from the abyss.

273.9 – 14 Reiteration: the saints will similarly be granted their prayers.

273.15 – 20 Mani begins to recount a second archetypal episode with a brief description of the constituent parts of the universe.

273.20 – 274.21 The great gods of the first and second emanations beseech the Father for a leader to undertake the process of salvation, the mechanisms for which they have put in place. They are granted the Third Ambassador.

274.22 – 29 Reiteration: the faithful elect and catechumens will similarly be granted their requests

274.30 – 277.3 (and see 274.16 – 19) Highly fragmented account of a third supplication regarding the liberation of the living soul; and perhaps further episodes concerning Jesus Splendour et al.

277.4 – 278.23 List of four victories achieved by prayer for the dead; with reiteration. Here perhaps might also be found Mani's answer concerning the problem of retribution for past sins.

278.23 – 280.1 Analogy of the process of intercession, and explanation.

280.1 – 19 Mani charges the catechumens with their mission, and receives the thanks of his original questioner (framing sequence).

Once again, it happened one time wh[ile our enlightener is sitting] / in the midst of the co[ngreg]ation. A cate[chu]me[n ...] / stood u[p] in front of him and sp[oke, questioni(271)ng] him. He says to hi[m: I be]seech you, my master, [that you / may] recount to me of this lesson; if I ask you it! [About / the] entreaty that the person makes in his pr[ayer, / if he] beseeches charity for someone who has been released from h[is [5] bo]dy.

Tell me: The entreaty and the prayer by which / [the] saints pray, beseeching for [someone; do they / h]elp him any? How is it benef[icial] for him; or el[se does it / he]lp him not? For we have heard from you [just so, th]at / each one shall receive retribution according to his deeds.

[10] So [n]ow, I beseech you my master, that you may instr[uc]t me / about this lesson for which I have asked you; whether [it is] tru[e]? / [F]or it is very great and honoured amongst pe[opl]e. /

[Then] the apostle speaks to him: As to the qu[esti]on / for [which] you ask me, the entreaty occurs and the true pra[yer] [15]

occurs! For every elect [Manich]aean*[146] person, / [if he] beseeches charity in total faith, he is [claimi]ng a / [re]quest from our compassionate Father. So, if he is beseec[hing] over him/[sel]f alone, he shall be favoured his entreaty; [bu]t i[f] again he is / [be]seeching on behalf of someone else, he shall be granted [hi]s r[20][eq]uest.

For this entreaty has been since the beginning [... / ...] the gods first made entreaty of their Father. They were granted / their entreaty and their request. For its part, the [h]oly church / that assumes the flesh is established in [pray/er, and] entreaty above [a]ll, and the pure request [...] [25] him and the son, the Christ. They shall give him it, na/[mely] these first ones that are prior to him.

I will inst/[ruct y]ou how it is that they shall / [beseech] their entreaty from the first ones; or in what form / [they shall en]treat [their req]uest, they who have asked for it [30] [...] every thing. The Great Spirit, the Mother / [of Life, she claimed and pra]yed and besought and glorified and praised (272) the first established on[e; who] is the Father. She [beso/ught] him an entreaty. She claimed of him a request. [She / received] a great gift; she and the many powers / [wi]th her.

She besought an entreaty on behalf of the First Man, [bec[5]ause of h]ow he had come forth and thrown himself dow[n. / He became] distant from the Mother of Life. He separated from her and g[ave / him]self; in great affliction. He joined war on [earth / with] the destruction and the grief and the weakness; in the worlds [of / dark]ness; in the abysses made of fear; in the midst [10] of the demons' d[i]t[ch]; amongst the powers of the dev[il]! /

Indeed, h[e is l]ike a king standing in the mids[t of] / h[is] enemies. And when the Mother of Life petitioned and prayed and [gl]/or[ified] and praised the Father, the [f]/irst established one, she did petition him that he might send [15] a po[wer]; a protector and redeemer and helper for the s/on of God who is set in affliction.

[They prayed and be]sought their Father, and he received from them their pr[30][ayer ...] he gave them their entreaty and their re/[quest ...] he summoned from him / [...] which is the Third / [Ambassador. H]e, he came from the power of his (274) [g]reatness. He saw the entire [soul], how it is entangled [in / a] chain and set fast. [It] sees the things of ac[t]/ivity that his brothers have constructed, that have come from [the hei/ghts]. Again, he saw the living soul, that it is entangled and set [fa[5]st] in a great torture. It is oppressed in the stink of the abys/[s that] is joined with it.

And therefore, he, the Ambassa[dor / ...] in his charity. [S]o, he revealed his way, / before this underworld that is dug deep down, / [to f]ree the living soul. He redeemed it from all the fleshes [10] of death wherein it is pained. He gave it ease. / H[e] set it right in the place of rest and joy.

And / again, he too, the Ambassador, he fulfilled the will / of these three; the will of his brothers who had besought / the Father for him. They claimed of him a request, together with [15] the [...] of the Father, the one that [...] he gave the entrea[ty / that they had besought] of him.

Behold, I have instructed you as to [20] the second entreaty by which they [first] besought the Father. / They were given the Third Ambassador. /

Now, happen you know this lesson: Each perfect elect / and every catechumen who believes, being / in the truth and set firm to prayer in faith, if he bese[25]eches and [inter]cedes with faith,

[25] Concerning the Two Essences. /

In this chapter Mani makes a forceful attack upon monotheism. The initial context is unclear, but possibly he is preaching directly to Christians. If there was nothing apart from God at the beginning, then where did all the evils in the world come from? He scornfully asks his listeners why they reject evil deeds, surely they should perform them if everything comes from God! Indeed, by not doing so they are committing the double crime against their God of rejecting his deeds, and then forgiving the sins of those who fall into them.

Alternatively, if evil did not come from God, the Manichaean position, his listeners have lied against God who will judge them. Mani asserts that Jesus, like all the true apostles, taught dualism. Here Mani develops the favourite proof-text about the good and evil trees, in its five-fold version (see 30.20 48.14 – 19 and kephalaion 2). He ends by warning that at the last judgement his listeners will receive their condemnation.

Once again, when our father looked, he saw a [...] / person [...] before him. [He] says [... the] / two essences that are present at the beginning [...] the [lig]/ht and the darkness, that which is good and that which is evi[l, life and] [30] death.

20 Concerning the Sect of the Basket. /

The interpretation of this chapter must remain speculative whilst the import of the crucial term ⲛⲟⲃⲉ ('basket'?), which is the description of the sect under discussion, remains unclear. From the context it may very tentatively be suggested that these were a sect of fruitarians, and that the basket (if this indeed is the meaning of the word) implies something like 'pickings' or even 'windfall'.

This could explain Mani's analogy about the universe, which leads on to the cosmological details in the latter and very fragmentary part of the kephalaion. Otherwise the relevance to the earlier discussion is uncertain.

Onc[e] again, on one of the occasions, as our enlightener is si[tting / ...] in the midst of the land of Babylon, a m[an came] / before him, a presbyter belonging to the [sect]*155 / of the basket. He is a worshipper of idols. He [... 25 ...] of the apostle. This presbyter [...] / who belongs to the sect of the basket.

Why [do they call / it] the sect of the 'basket'? For I see the [...] / when it hangs from the tree, they shall not [... / ... w]hen it will be picked in the [... 30 ...] they shall call it [...] in these ways [...] grapes [...] / grapes. The ap[ost]5le speaks to the presbyter of the sect of the basket: So, [the un/i]verse in which you stand i[s l/i]ke a tree; while you are [li]ke the frui[t that h/a]ngs from the tree. [30] Concerning the 'Assent' and the 'Amen'. /

The edited and published text of the Kephalaia currently ends in the midst of this chapter at page 291 (Böhlig 1966); although page 292 has been made available in an article that discusses the liturgical context (ibid 1985). However, W. -P. Funk, who is now editing the remainder of the codex, has kindly provided me with his working text of the Coptic for the entire kephalaion. It is from this that the translation of chapter 122 has been completed.

291.4 – 292.8 The assent and the amen are convictions proclaimed by the community at prayer; as in Christian practice. In this chapter Mani asserts their divine archetypes in the summons and the obedience, the two gods that embody the will to redemption. Thus the First Man was redeemed from the abyss; and in the present time they are incarnate in the holy church. Therefore, the assent and the amen uttered by the congregation seal the redemption for which they ask.

292.9 – 25 The assent and the amen also bear forth a beautiful living image sculpted by the faith of the believers; and which ascends daily to the land of rest.

292.26 – 294.22 The assent and the amen are also a great power; for in prayer they bring help both to the sick and at times of temptation.

[O]nce again, one of the disciples [... / ...] to him: Tell me, my master, [... (291) ... the] name that we may utter over the blessing [... / ...] we bless, and also the prayer [by] which we pr[ay]. / Tell us: What is the 'assent' and the 'a[men']? /

Our enlightener [s]ays to him: The assent and the a[men] [5] have come about from these great ones of the powers. They were given the na[me] / as the assent belongs to the summons and the amen [belongs to] / the answer.

Just as the summon[s an]d the obedience [ar]e / the ones that opened the portals of mercy and entreaty / for the First Man, so they also became portal[s for the Mo]ther [10] [of Lif]e and the Father of the living. The Firs[t] Ma/n sought and found his redeemer. [An]d [also] the Mother / of Life and the Father of the living sought [...] / this runner, who came forth from them, who is the / First Man; but the summons and the obedience became the [15] portals for them.

Now, in this way they have become portal[s f]or the ae/ons of greatness towards the First Man, and the s[ou]l that was / [c]onjoined with death. They became helpers [...] of the / First Man during his ascent. They gave him [...] / the Father of Life and the Mother of Life [...] [20] They are purifiers of the living soul, be[ing] he/[lp]ers and bestowers of remembrance for it, be it either in [... / ...] in the tree or in the creation of flesh [... / ... the] holy [c]hurch [... / ...] the earth [... summ]ons and the obedience that [25] [...] the portals [...] in the holy church / [... he]lpers, bestowers of power and collectors / [...] teacher [... / ... / ...] purified for thei[r s]ake [... [30] ...] a letter [... / ... (292) that] it might be uttered over the psalm and over [the prayer, / with] the entreaty and the supplication. For, whenever o[ne will / b]less and respond to the assent and the a[men, / the] assent and the amen [shall] seal the blesser. Also, [when] [5] the congregation will beseech an entreaty wi[th / a questi]on, and they all answer and say 'verily an[d / ame]n', they shall seal the entreaty that the congregatio[n] has / as[ked] for and besought. /

Hap[pen] you know that the assent and the amen [are] a great per[so]n [10] [w]ho exists in [... / al]l of you, and you rejoice in him with great jo[y]; / be[caus]e he came to you profitably. He has agreed befo[re] / you to bring forth by him a new birth daily, / [v]ery go[od] and honoured in the presence of the living ones abov[e]. [15] [S]o, when grea[t cro]wds of people utter the assent and the amen, / happen you know that the sound / of all the people who respond shall collec[t] / and come together, and it fixes and sculpts [...] / it is [for]med and makes a good image, ver[y] beautiful [20] and honoured. It goes up to the land of tranquillity and / peac[e]. It receives all their grace, because [... / ...] it gathering what has ascended from [a]ll [these] / who responded. For it was uttered by th[em / a]ll. It separated and attained the land of tr[anquillity] [25] and peace by their joy and their alms. /

Happen you know that the assent and this amen are [a great] / power. Whenever one will be found in [... / ...] in bodily danger [...] / sick [...] they pray for it [... [30] f]or the [ass]ent and the amen; and [... / ...] in his sickness, and he improves [... / ...] with power, and they entreat [... Again, it happens [... / ...] among the elect [...] / awakens in us, and it is established [... / ...] in evil counsels, and he is set firm [and ...] 10 his [compani]ons, and he confesses his sin and [...] / as he will beseech for himself charity, so that if [G]od / will {spare}*157 him this temptation that [... / ...] his [... / ...] and they call over him the assent and the ame[n ...] 15 immediately there is a power come from the assent and [the] amen. / It annuls the lust and the temptatio[n t]hat he has carried [ar]ound / in him. And also, whenever a prayer will be be[so]ught / over that person [... the a]men / that [...] hi[m], as he utters it [...] 20 immediately there is a great power come to him ou[t] from / the assent and the amen. It helps him and [... / ...] in [...] / the assent and the amen go up to the ships, and they [... / ... 25 ...] upon him in the [... / ...] power [... / ...] in it, a[s] the [... / ...] at a place [... / ... 30 ...] Now, whenever he may see them [... / ... / ... Preface

The present work, The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, is primarily a mass of unpublished documentation I excerpted from the Manichaean archives in the main depositories, Berlin and Dublin, in 1984–1986, and from interviews with those directly involved. Copies were given to these two depositories in 1991, as well as to Wolf-Peter Funk of the University of Laval in Québec, Canada, the leading authority in this field, to whom I hence also gave my own Manichaean archives themselves. Hence the present publication does not continue the history of research up to the present, but leaves that for the next generation of scholarship.

The presentation contains very extensive—but often inconclusive—information; this uncertainty is indicated here, lest their publication give them a degree of certainty that is not appropriate. Yet the amount of otherwise inaccessible but reliable information, from interviews, correspondence, and unpublished documents, should not be lost from sight, but should be made available to the scholarship of the future.

To facilitate reading, indeed to keep the reader from being lost in detail, the extensive documentation is preceded by two already published summaries. First is a brief abstract prepared for the 18th International Congress of Byzantine Studies in Moscow, August 8–15, 1991. This then is followed by a more extensive introduction: "The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, 1929–1989." It was originally published in International Kongress zum Manichäismus 6.–10. August 1989 St. Augustin/Bonn, edited by Gernot Wiessner and Hans-Joachim Klimkeit, in Studies in Oriental Religions 23 (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1992) 19–62.

The presentation of material is less complete for the material in the Chester Beatty Library, since the sorting and recording had to be done primarily for the scattered Berlin material. Yet the extensive archival material in Dublin makes it clear that considerably more detail could be added to the presentation of the return of the Chester Beatty codices after World War II, to the description of the work of Rolf Ibscher in London and Dublin, and to the analysis of the Dublin holdings.

ABSTRACT

The Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi

The seven Manichaean papyrus codices of the fourth or fifth century were found in illicit excavation in 1929 in the desert in the ruins of Τερενοῦθις near Medinet Madi at the southern end of the Fayyum. They were acquired in about equal halves by A. Chester Beatty for his library then in London, now in Dublin, and by Carl Schmidt for the Papyrussammlung (papyrus collection) of the Staatliche Museen of Berlin. The status of the seven codices follows:

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX A, THE PSALMS

Beatty acquired the front part of the codex from the Cairo dealer Maurice Nahman in 1931, and he had acquired the back part in 1930. The back part was conserved in Berlin by Hugo Ibscher and published by Charles R. C. Allberry in 1938. As Ibscher conserved each leaf of the front part, H. J. Polotsky transcribed each in Berlin. Copies went to both Beatty and W. E. Crum, for use in his Coptic Dictionary. Since the edition was never completed, it was not published, but in 1986/1988, Søren Giversen published a few lines of Psalm 119 he derived by Polotsky. The front part of the codex was put on loan at the Royal Library of Copenhagen in 1984 for Giversen to publish in facsimile and critical editions. He published both parts only in facsimile edition in 1988.

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX B, THE SYNAXEIS

Beatty acquired this codex from a Fayyumic dealer in 1930 (except for 31 residual leaves that Schmidt acquired in 1931, P[15995]). Beatty turned it over to Ibscher to conserve. By 1939 only thirteen leaves of Beatty's part had been conserved and returned to London. They moved with the library to Dublin in 1953 and to Copenhagen in 1984. Giversen published a facsimile edition in 1986. Beginning in 1934, the rest of Beatty's part of the codex was kept in Hugo Ibscher's home in Kleinmachnow, near Berlin, for conservation. But after Ibscher's death in 1943, his son Rolf Ibscher reported putting Beatty's parts of the codex in a reinforced concrete bunker at the Zoo Train Station of Berlin for safekeeping. After the bombing of that bunker in 1944, Rolf Ibscher reported having his assistant P. Seidel remove the codex so that Ibscher could take it to the home of his father-in-law, Wolf Henry Doering, in Schondorf on the Ammersee in Bavaria. From time to time Rolf Ibscher worked at conserving the leaves there. The West German authorities took control of the codex and engaged Carsten Colpe to edit it in 1956–1957. So the codex was taken to Göttingen. When he died in 1967, Rolf Ibscher had conserved only about half this material. When the Egyptian Museum was created in West Berlin in 1967, the material was deposited there. In 1985 the curator of the papyrus collection in that museum, William Brashear, asked me to investigate this material. There are 125 extant unpublished leaves plus the unconserved remainder of the book block. I reported on it to the Fachkommission Byzantinistik of the Historiker-Gesellschaft of the German Democratic Republic in Halle in 1986. Both museums authorized me to organize an edition of all the Manichaean material in Berlin. The transcription of the scarcely legible conserved leaves was begun in 1985. Gesine Schenke Robinson worked on the thirty-one leaves on the Museums-Insel of East Berlin, and others (especially Wolf-Peter Funk and Paul Mirecki) worked on those leaves in West Berlin. The photographing took place in Berlin in preparation for a facsimile edition of all the Manichaean material in Berlin, Vienna, and Warsaw, planned to be published by the Akademie-Verlag of Berlin.

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX C, VOLUME TWO OF THE KEPHALAIA

Beatty acquired this codex from the Fayyumic dealer prior to Schmidt's talking to that dealer in the spring of 1931. It was conserved by Rolf Ibscher after World War II and published in facsimile edition by Giversen in 1986. A committee of Søren Giversen, Rodolphe Kasser, and Martin Krause held exclusive rights to publish a critical edition of the Dublin–Copenhagen material. Kasser was entrusted with organizing the publication of the critical edition of this codex.

CHESTER BEATTY LIBRARY CODEX D, THE HOMILIES

Beatty acquired the bulk of this codex from Nahman with an option to buy in 1930. But Beatty released it to Carl Schmidt for Berlin in 1932 (P^{15999}). It was not considered conservable but was put on display as a showpiece for how impossible this task was. The unconserved book block is thought to have been among the materials stored in the bunker at the Zoo train station. From there it was thought to have been taken to the Soviet command post at the castle Friedrichsfelde in 1945–1946, and then to Leningrad in 1946, though it was not found when the material was returned to Berlin in 1958. A smaller part of the codex was acquired by Beatty in 1931, conserved by Ibscher, edited by Polotsky, and published in 1934. Giversen published a facsimile edition of the codex in 1987.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P^{15996}, VOLUME ONE OF THE KEPHALAIA

Schmidt acquired this codex from Nahman in 1930. Ibscher conserved most of the leaves. H. J. Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig edited them. They were published in fascicles—by 1940, a first volume through page 244, line 20. Böhlig published through page 291 in 1966, and through page 292 in 1985. Professor Grohmann of Prague acquired three unpublished remains for the Austrian National Library, where they are still extant. Five unpublished Berlin leaves are in Warsaw, where they were brought after having been lost in transit between Berlin and Leningrad in 1946. In Berlin there are some ninety extant unpublished leaves, equaling 180 pages.

The total of unpublished extant leaves then becomes 3 + 5 + 90 = 98 leaves or 6 + 10 + 180 = 196 pages. Wolf-Peter Funk is preparing a critical edition. Polotsky has put at Funk's disposal for the critical edition his transcriptions and translations located at the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, at the Griffith Institute of the Ashmoleon Museum in Oxford, and at the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P[15997], THE ACTS

This codex with its covers (which were photographed and published) was sold by a provincial dealer to Nahman, who sold the codex to Schmidt in 1931. One leaf that Ibscher conserved was returned to London, was moved with the library to Dublin, and was included in the material put on deposit in Copenhagen. Giversen published it in facsimile in 1987.

There are seven or eight unpublished leaves still in Berlin. Part of one unpublished leaf may be at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University. There may thus be nine or ten extant leaves, eighteen or twenty pages. The unconserved book block and wooden covers did not return from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958. None of the leaves of this codex in Berlin or Warsaw have been published.

BERLIN PAPYRUS COLLECTION P[15998], THE LETTERS

This codex was also sold by the provincial dealer to Nahman, who sold it to Schmidt in 1931. There are six unpublished leaves that were returned from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958 and three unpublished leaves in the National Museum in Warsaw. There are also fifteen containers with eighteen leaves (three secondarily assigned to the Kephalaia) among those that probably lay half-conserved in the Ibscher home throughout the war that may belong to this codex. A leaf originally labeled as belonging to the Letters but reassigned to the Acts probably should be counted as belonging to the Letters. This would make a total of twenty-eight leaves or fifty-six pages. The book block did not return from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958. Hence none of the leaves of this codex were published.

INTRODUCTION

The Fate of the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi, 1929–1989

> As you will remember Terentianus Maurus in De litteris syllabic et metric: "Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli" [The fate of the books depends on the intelligence of the readers] which is often taken as said in the sense that books have their history. They have indeed, and also the Medinet Madi manuscripts have their fate as we all know. Some details, however, are still unknown to many although they are important in order for better understanding of the texts.
> —Søren Giversen

The seven Manichaean codices from Medinet Madi (Τερενοῦθις), whose ruins are still impressive (in the desert on the southern edge of the Fayyum), were made known to the scholarly community primarily through the essay of Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund in Ägypten,"[1] although much information not included there has more recently become available from the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin.[2]

1. Schmid and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 4–90, with two plates and a contribution by Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschriften," 82–85. Most of the information in that essay is not repeated here but is presupposed as generally known or readily available.

2. Copies of relevant archive documents were kindly supplied to the Manichaean archive of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity, which provided a chronological history of the Manichaean archive. This inventory was then supplied to Søren Giversen, who, in August 1987, asked the Chester Beatty Library to supplement material he already had with copies of some material listed in the inventory. Dr. Pat Donlon, then Reference Librarian and Curator of the Western Collection, graciously honored this request.

Schmidt narrated that he had been shown some of the material by antiquities dealers in Egypt on two trips, only the second of which is actually dated, to the spring of 1931. From this one has inferred that his first trip was in 1930,[3] which Schmidt has elsewhere stated to be the date of the discovery.[4] But Søren Giversen has reported that the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange was shown some of the material in Cairo on November 29, 1929, by Maurice Nahman, the leading Cairo antiquities dealer of the time, though he did not acquire anything.[5] Hence the date of the discovery, if one may assume such material tends to reach the market promptly, should be corrected to read 1929.[6]

SIR CHESTER BEATTY'S ACQUISITIONS

On Schmidt's first trip he had been shown what he was able to identify on the spot as part of the Kephalaia, since he had just been reading proofs on Karl Holl's edition of Epiphanius's Panarion that refers to it! Yet he did not acquire it when first shown it, but continued on his trip to Jerusalem, with plans to secure authorization for its acquisition by the time he passed through Cairo on his return trip. But before that time,[7] or, now to be more specific, on March 23, 1930, Chester Beatty had obtained on approval from the same Cairo antiquities dealer Maurice Nahman two other manuscripts and two wooden covers.[8]

3. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften."

4. Schmidt, Neue Originalquellen des Manichäismus aus Äegypten, 4. Similarly Allberry, "Manichaean Studies," 337–49, especially 340, gives 1930 as the date when the "library was brought to light," as well as the date when Schmidt was shown the Kephalaia "by a Fayum dealer." The dealer in question was actually the Cairo dealer Maurice Nahman, who obviously had contacts with the Fayyum, but not the dealer located in the Fayyum whom Schmidt first visited with regard to these codices in 1931.

5. Giversen, Psalm Book, Part 1, 7–8. He points out that this date, which Lange's extant diary documents, was also confirmed by Schmidt in an extant letter of February 20, 1936. A similar report (Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 265–72), especially 271–72, states that the antiquities dealer who showed "one of the manuscripts" to Lange was Maurice Nahman.

6. Giversen, Manichaean Papyri of the Chester Beatty Library, 1, speaks of "their rediscovery in 1929," in the quotation used as the motto at the beginning of this paper. This motto is repeated in somewhat different terms in Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 271.

8. In the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library is a ledger sheet with the letterhead of Maurice Nahman, dated March 23, 1930. It was made out to Beatty and

At the end of May, Beatty had Hugo Ibscher, the Conservator of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin, who had worked periodically for him in London, assess the chances of conserving the material, since the leaves were stuck together by salt crystals resulting, one assumed, from lying in dampness over the centuries. Ibscher said the larger and more expensive manuscript, which only later was identified as the bulk of the Homilies codex (see below), could not be conserved.[9] Beatty apparently decided already then not to acquire it, for he did not send it along with the other to Berlin with Ibscher for conservation, but retained it in London for two years (see below).

Chester Beatty Library Codex A, the Psalms, Part Two

The smaller of the manuscripts acquired by Beatty on March 23, 1930, with an option to buy was assessed by Ibscher as "very difficult" to conserve.[10] Beatty cabled Nahman on May 31, 1930, that he was willing to pay only £200, rather than the £500 that Nahman had asked. But on June 2, 1930, Nahman cabled that he would not accept the offer. Yet Beatty had already turned over the manuscript to Ibscher, who had just taken it back to Berlin with him to conserve. On or before June 9, 1930, while in New York on a business trip, Beatty agreed by transatlantic cable to pay £500. It turned out to be the latter part of the Psalms codex, which was published by Charles R. C. Allberry in 1938.[11] Photographic reproductions were published by Søren Giversen in 1988.[12] listed fifteen items for sale with their prices, to which have been added annotations as to which are to be kept and which returned. A last item, offered for £1,200 reads: "Two Coptic manuscripts an[d] two binding[s] in wood." Underneath, notes were added that read:

> On approval
> £700 Mss
> £500 Mss
> £40 Binding

9. Hugo Ibscher arrived in London on May 26, 1930, according to Beatty's cable to an impatient Nahman on May 28, 1930. On May 31, 1930, Beatty cabled Nahman: "Doctor Ibscher thinks can do nothing with large book."

Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis

Schmidt reported that a Fayyumic dealer had explained to him in the Spring of 1931 that the discovery had been divided into eight parts among three dealers. The Fayyumic dealer himself had retained three parts, Nahman three, and a provincial dealer two. The Fayyumic dealer told Schmidt that he had already sold all three of his parts to Beatty.[13] Since there are apparently only two codices acquired by Beatty that he did not get from Nahman, the bulk of the Synaxeis and Volume Two of the Kephalaia (see below), one of these must have been dismembered by the time of the partition, a vandalism to which Schmidt referred in general, thereby producing three "codices" out of two codices. Since the Synaxeis codex is known to have been dismembered by this time (see below), one may assume that it was the one counted as two of the three "codices" acquired by Beatty from the Fayyumic dealer.

On November 27, 1930, Beatty turned over to Ibscher in London, to take back to Berlin for conservation, another "Coptic book."[14] Its acquisition is not otherwise documented, but it may be postulated to have been from the Fayyumic acquisition, which may have been cash and carry, without a written receipt. But the absence of documentation could be due merely to the incompleteness of the Archives or of our survey of them.[15]

Schmidt reported having acquired in the spring of 1931 for the sake of completeness "a few unimpressive piles" from a codex Beatty had acquired in the Fayyum.[16] Only two codices were shared between London and Berlin, the Homilies and the Synaxeis. This could not be the Homilies, since the Berlin part of this codex was later acquired from Nahman, once Beatty, who had it on approval, had decided not to acquire it (see below). Hence the Synaxeis must be for this reason also one of the codices Beatty acquired in the Fayyum, and indeed

13. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8.

14. In a letter of November 27, 1930, to Sir Alan Gardiner, Beatty speaks of sending Gardiner a Coptic book to have Ibscher put in his bag after verifying that it is satisfactorily packed.

15. The two manuscripts brought to London in April 1931 (see below) are recorded to have been brought that month, but a receipt from an antiquities dealer has not been located. The fact that the two manuscripts are in each case the other part of the two codices acquired from Nahman a year earlier supports the assumption that these came from Nahman.

16. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8.

prior to the spring of 1931.[17] Thus it may be the book sent to Berlin for conservation at the end of November 1930, although this could also have been Volume Two of the Kephalaia. In fact, since both may have been unbound, and the Synaxeis was in more than one part, the "book" may have been a stack of papyrus pads without a clear distinction of where one codex began and another ended. In fact, someone had written in by hand on the typed letter of November 27, 1930, the word "Papyri" just before "Coptic Book," which might indicate that it looked less like a book than an amorphous stack of papyri.

Thirteen leaves of the Synaxeis codex were conserved by Hugo Ibscher and returned to London by the spring of 1939.[18] They were moved with the Chester Beatty Library to Dublin in 1953 and in 1984 were put on loan at the Royal Library of Copenhagen for Søren Giversen to study.[19] Giversen published photographic reproductions in 1986.[20] It is to be hoped that these thirteen leaves can be integrated fully in any future critical edition of the Synaxeis rather than being subjected to the either-or conditions announced by Rodolphe Kasser on behalf of an International Committee for the Publication of the Manichaean Coptic Papyri from Medinet Madi Belonging to the Chester Beatty Library (Søren Giversen, President; Rodolphe Kasser; Martin Krause), to the effect that persons editing Berlin materials

17. Ibid., 30, makes this explicit.

18. On April 22, 1939, Sir Alan Gardiner wrote Beatty that he had some Mani plates he would return soon. A day-book kept by Joan Kingford Wood of Beatty's library staff since 1927 recorded on May 3, 1939: "From Dr. G[ardiner]. Mani. Pap. Codex B.C. KEPHALAIA 49 in all (Cod. B. 51–62, 63–76 Cod. C. 1, 3, 4, 39–48, 49–58) = 49." An entry dated July 5, 1939, as "Fetched by Mr. A[llberry]" "Codex B KEPHALAIA pages 51–62, 63–76." Apparently two codices were distinguished, as B and C, yet both were on this occasion designated Kephalaia, whereas Beatty had only one Kephalaia codex, Codex C. Since Codex A, Psalms, is of a smaller format than the others (see below), and Codex D, the part of the Homilies owned by Beatty, had already been clearly identified and in fact published, the 13 leaves designated Codex B 51–76 must be from the only remaining codex acquired by Beatty, the Synaxeis.

19. Whereas Giversen had requested about 171 leaves on November 24, 1982, of Patrick Henchy, then librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on November 7, 1983 he raised the figure to 184 in a request to the current director and librarian, Wilfrid Lockwood. The inventory dated January 13, 1984 and validated with the stamp of the Danish Royal Library lists as "Codex B" "13 glasses" numbered "51–76."

20. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix, states: "Pages 101–126 bear facsimiles of the leaves which Hugo Ibscher has labelled 'Codex B.' . . . The sheets are marked from 51 to 76, the equivalent of this edition's 101–126."

(where the bulk of the Synaxeis codex is now located, see below) may not participate in editing Dublin materials.[21] Yet, as Alexander Böhlig has subsequently stated: "It is too onesided, when the Dublin team wishes to forbid simultaneous work on the two parts of the discovery, since, after all, overlappings of the material are present."[22] In fact the publication of the facsimile edition puts the facsimiles of these thirteen leaves in the public domain, free to the scholarly world to publish in critical editions as it sees fit. For, as Martin Krause, though a member of the committee advocating this segregation in the membership of the two teams, has said (with regard to the facsimile edition of the Nag Hammadi codices), the purpose of a facsimile edition is "so that the manuscripts after their publication in facsimile volumes stand avail-

21. At the meeting of the Association Francophone de Coptologie at the Louvre Museum in Paris on May 23, 1986, Rodolphe Kasser read and distributed an announcement entitled "Projet international pour la publication des manuscrits manichéens coptes de Medinet Madi appartenant à la Chester Beatty Library (premier communiqué)."

> Soon after this [the publication of a facsimile edition] the critical edition of the same texts will appear under the responsibility of the same committee [Søren Giversen, president; Rodolphe Kasser; Martin Krause], which will distribute this task between coptologists . . . only those persons will be invited to participate in the editio princeps of the Manichaean Coptic texts in the Chester Beatty Library who has [sic] not already obtained this possibility concerning the editio princeps of the Manichaean Coptic papyri of Berlin or Vienna.

This announcement followed directly upon my invitation to French-language Coptologists to participate in the work of an "International Committee for the Manichaean Codices of Medinet Madi" that was being planned. This invitation was published in Newsletter 19 of the International Association for Coptic Studies, August 1986, Annex 1, pp. 3–5, especially p. 4: ". . . qualified scholars are welcome to offer their services . . . For it is not the intention of the project to limit access to the material, but rather to facilitate access to it." The announcement by Kasser, president of the International Association for Coptic Studies, followed in French and English on pp. 6–9.

The Board of the International Association for Coptic Studies, at its meeting on June 12, 1986, "expressed its approval of both [projects], and hoped that there will be collaboration between the two projects," as published on page 1 of the same Newsletter.

22. Böhlig, "Neue Initiativen zur Erschliessung der koptisch-manichäischen Bibliothek von Medinet Madi," 245. "Es ist zu einseitig, wenn das Dublin-Team gleichzeitige Arbeit an beiden Fundgruppen verbieten will, sind doch Uberkreuzungen des Materials vorhanden."

able to all scholars for study and work" (Krause's emphasis).[23] A transcription of the published facsimiles of the 13 Synaxeis leaves that has been prepared by Wolf-Peter Funk in conjunction with transcriptions of the leaves in Berlin that he is preparing should preferably be published together, for which purpose access to the papyri in Copenhagen should be granted to him and others working on the Berlin part of codices also represented in Dublin/Copenhagen. Negotiations during the conference at Bonn produced an agreement to at least a degree of cooperation:

> Persons participating in the editio princeps of material in Berlin can work together with persons participating in the editio princeps of material in Dublin / Copenhagen as a joint team to edit a shared text. In the naming of persons on such joint editorial teams Giversen will represent the Dublin group and Robinson the Berlin group. The person or persons named by each group will be primarily responsible for editing the leaves of that group, but members of such a joint team can study the papyri at both places, work in close collaboration with each other, and publish a joint edition.

A first step toward the implementation of this policy was a visit of Wolf-Peter Funk to Copenhagen, where he was permitted to study the 13 leaves of the Synaxeis codex. (Giversen has not approved subsequent plans to cooperate in editing the two volumes of the Kephalaia.)

Some of the material, while undergoing conservation, was not kept at the Papyrus Collection in Berlin, but in the Ibscher home, where Ibscher was permitted to work three days a week from the age of 60, i.e., from 1934 on.[24] Though Beatty himself went to Berlin before the war to bring back his papyri, he apparently brought back

24. Reported by Alexander Böhlig in a letter of February 10, 1986. A letter from Otto Firchow of October 28, 1960, had stated:

> In my opinion the papyri [Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis] ought to be found with Dr. Rolf Ibscher probably already mounted and glazed. Dr. Hugo Ibscher used to carry out this kind of work in his own home. If I were still in Berlin, or if I had known about the matter a few months ago, I could have offered you my help. I should suggest that you get in touch with Rolf Ibscher, who has no connection with the Berlin Museum. Let me say again that the papyri cannot be in the Berlin Museum but must have been in Hugo Ibscher's private possession.

only what had been conserved.[25] C. R. C. Allberry reported in May 1940 "that Dr. Ibscher had the remainder of Mr. Beatty's papyrus at his house in the country, at Kleinmachnow."[26] But there were in the home also materials belonging to Berlin, such as unconserved leaves of P[15996], the Kephalaia,[27] and P[15998], the Letters.[28] It would be to these Berlin holdings that Ibscher referred in 1949, to the effect that the remainder of the (Berlin) Papyrus Collection was in his home.[29]

25. Joan Kingford Wood wrote on February 7, 1960, her reminiscences:

> . . . it must have been when things were boiling up in Germany against the Jews, before hostilities began with us, that Sir Chester went over to Berlin to fetch the remainder of the papyri, the Manichaean . . . He went and brought back the papyri. But then Sir Chester has a way of overcoming difficulties with authority and persuasion.

26. The black loose-leaf folder in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library entitled "Papyrus. Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue," in the section "Manichaean Pap." presents this quotation, with the reference: "(see letter from Allberry)."

27. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 182: "Of the material in Berlin only a very small part has always remainded in Berlin. It was the last 20 leaves of the Berlin Kephalaia book."

28. Ibid., 184, 182:

> Of this book one finds in Berlin, put under glass already in the pre-war period, 6 leaves . . . , and about 22 leaves in half-conserved condition. The folders in which they lay were numbered . . .
> The urgently needed reglassing of all the pieces that had been glassed by Hugo Ibscher and that returned to Berlin in 1958 was undertaken by Rolf Ibscher beginning in June of this year (1960), along with the conservation of a few half-conserved leaves that Ibscher Sr. had at first put to one side as too difficult, doubtlessly correctly, for it had to do usually with double or triple leaves.

The half-conserved leaves are here distinguished as in folders rather than as glassed. And the reference to material being returned to Berlin is limited to the glassed material. This would indicate that the half-conserved material in folders had not been taken to Leningrad and returned in 1958 to Berlin. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin lists only 6 glassed leaves as going "to the East" and "back."

29. Ibscher wrote J. V. S. Wilkinson, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on December 31, 1949: "The misfortune of our persecuted Museums with the destroyed rooms of the Papyrus Collection led after all to this, that the collection was stationed with me in [my] house, and that brought us many a convenience."

Actually the material was already in the Ibscher home; it is very doubtful (see below) if any papyri were still in the museum when it was very heavily damaged by air raids, or that Ibscher could have rescued any such material from the gutted Neues Museum to take to his home. There is a similar allusion to material in the home in a letter of January 9, 1949 from Ibscher to Beatty, of which only a translation of the

The bulk of the Papyrus Collection not in the Ibscher home, along with other Museum holdings, was put for safekeeping during the war in a reinforced concrete bunker (removed after the war) at the Zoo Train Station, in what became West Berlin. The Museum was indeed very heavily damaged in a massive air raid on February 3, 1945, which left intact only the outer walls of the gutted Neues Museum, where the Papyrus Collection had been housed.

Rolf Ibscher reported that after his father's death on May 26, 1943, he added to the storage deposit in the Zoo bunker "the Manichaean papyrus books,"[30] presumably meaning the book blocks that had been in the home where his father had been conserving them, i.e., separating off the individual leaves. "But after 20 July 1944 [when the Zoo bunker was itself bombed[31]] this place too did not seem to me safe enough." Hence "with the approval of General Director Kümmel, in xi 1944."[32] Ibscher had an assistant, P. Seidel, get three book blocks from the bunker, in order to take them for safekeeping to Schondorf on the Ammer Lake in Bavaria, to the home of his father-in-law, the publisher Wolf Henry Doering. Rolf Ibscher maintained that he removed relevant paragraph is in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library: "We are grateful for one piece of good fortune which follows from my present situation in so far as it has been possible up to now to maintain our house properly heated on account of the fact that since the destruction of the Museums, I have continued to work at home and also harbour the remainder of the Papyrus collection which has not yet been transferred to West Germany."

None of the Berlin holdings of the Manichaean codices are known to have ever been taken to West Germany; the suggestion that some might already be in West Germany is no doubt a reference to the Synaxeis, which Ibscher mistakenly took to be the Berlin Codex, P[15998], the Letters, which he had taken to West Germany (see below).

31. On November 9, 1960, I. E. S. Edwards of the Department of Egyptian Antiquities of the British Museum wrote R. J. Hayes, then acting head of the Chester Beatty Library, that he had heard from Rudolf Anthes (director of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin 1935–1939, 1945–1950, but also enlisted during the war to move the objects from the Museum to safekeeping) that this was the reason for the removal of the material from the Zoo bunker.

the material "on my own responsibility."[33] Böhlig has reconciled the divergence as to the person responsible as follows:[34]

> Rolf Ibscher had the authorization from General Director Kümmel to get the Dublin material from the anti-aircraft tower and take it to Bavaria. He did this in the company of the Museum worker P. Seidel, who has since died. In the process the idea came to him that it would perhaps be useful, in case worst came to worst, also to take along one of the Berlin codices. This decision was, as far as I know, spontaneous. That it was worth it, is shown by the success. These things remained completely preserved, in contrast to what the Soviets had "saved."

After the war, Beatty had sought with the help of Sir Alan Gardiner to establish contact with Rolf Ibscher so as to secure the return of his codices, but apparently without success. Rolf Ibscher himself seems to have been the first to establish contact, by writing to England on January 28, 1946, to the effect that he had saved Beatty's material, "together with a part of the Berlin Mani Codices," whereas the rest of the Berlin part had been taken East.[35]

Ibscher's initiative may have resulted from contact with the occupying forces, for it was at precisely the same time that these official channels seem to have located the material that had been kept at Schondorf. Alexander Böhlig has given 1946 as the date and Schondorf the place that two codices (Part 1 of the Psalms and Volume

35. In a letter of November 16, 1946, Sir Alan Gardiner wrote to Joan Kingsford Wood, translating from a letter of Ibscher's of January 28, 1946 to him: "However much there is to say on this topic (his family affairs) it is more important to tranquillize you in the matter of the Mani MSS. or rather Codices. They are saved! After Father's death I took them, together with a part of the Berlin Mani Codices to Bavaria to my Father-in-law outside the danger zone; for also here in Kleinmachnow bombs often fell."

In a letter of May 17, 1946, from Gardiner to Wood, Gardiner reported that a letter of January 28, 1946, from Rolf Ibscher to Sir Herbert Thompson, who had died, had been forwarded to him. Gardiner quoted from Ibscher's letter: "You will know, perhaps through Dr. Gardiner or via the British Museum, that and how I could save the London possession from the effects and consequences of the war." Gardiner added: "He goes on to say that all the remainder of the MSS. belonging to the Berlin Museum had been taken East."

two of the Kephalaia) were released to Beatty,[36] information that is all the more reliable in view of the fact that it was Böhlig himself (who was in Munich at the end of the war) who had "separated them at Schondorf."[37] Böhlig considered it possible that, in view of inadequately marked parts, some material belonging to Berlin may have been released to London, and some belonging to London retained at Schondorf.[38] The 13 leaves that were in London (later in Dublin and then in Copenhagen), to which Böhlig here refers as perhaps belonging to Berlin but by mistake sent to England, do not, however, belong to the Berlin Letters codex P[15998], as he at the time conjectured (see below), but rather to the Synaxeis codex that belonged to Beatty; they had been quite appropriately returned to London before the war (see above). But regarding the converse possibility, that London material may have been retained in Schondorf: Böhlig himself was the first to publish, in 1957, the admission that by mistake the book block of Beatty's Synaxeis stayed at Schondorf rather than being returned to London (see below).

At the beginning of 1946 Sir John Forsdyke, director of the British Museum, received a vague report about Beatty's codices having been located in Germany, according to "the military authorities."[39] The

36. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit an den koptischen Manichaica," 180–81: "There [at the house of the father-in-law in Schondorf] Sir Chester Beatty had the parts of the Codices A and C picked up in the year 1946."

37. Rolf Ibscher reported in his broken English in a letter of October 6, 1955, to Beatty: "This wooden box [taken from the Zoo bunker] contained one Berlin manuscript (for which I had specially asked Mr. Seidel) to make certain, that at l[e]ast part of the Berlin collection also was saved, in addition those papyri which reached you in London in 1947 after Dr. Böhlig had separated them at Schondorf." In an interview on July 10, 1986, Prof. and Mrs. Böhlig confirmed the fact that they went to Schondorf in the absence of Rolf Ibscher and recalled having turned over the material after only a superficial examination of the contents.

38. Böhlig, in a letter of February 10, 1986: "Whether something was then confused when turned over to the emissaries of Chester Beatty, so that in the end result a Berlin part came to Dublin and an English part (the Synaxeis codex) to Göttingen / West Berlin, I consider to be quite possible. That the individual parts were not adequately marked I also consider possible."

39. From a letter of Forsdyke to Wilkinson of November 15, 1946: "The facts (so far as I have any) about Mr. Chester Beatty's papyri in Germany are that a box of papyri marked 'British Museum' but identified by us as his was found there and reported to me by the military authorities. I told them that I wished to receive them as soon as they could be released and despatched, and I have no doubt that this will ultimately be done in that order—if they are not in the Russian zone."

military authorities in this case would seem to have been Squadron Leader Christopher Norris, in charge of seeking "works of art, etc., in Germany that come from Britain."[40]

Forsdyke had written Norris as early as February 15, 1946, that the British Museum would receive Beatty's material if he could deliver it.[41] This suggests that Norris had just written Forsdyke that Beatty's material had been located. The timing of such a letter would thus fit that of Ibscher's letters of January 28, 1946, to London. From this, one may infer that the unpublished Part One of Beatty's Psalms, Codex A, and his Volume Two of the Kephalaia, Codex C, were probably turned over to the American forces in Schondorf about 1946, and were kept in the Fine Arts Repository that the Americans established in Munich in 1946.[42]

At the beginning of October 1947 Lieutenant Colonel Hugh Murray Baillie, of the Fine Arts Commission of the British Zone located in Düsseldorf, brought to Düsseldorf two codices thought to belong to the British Museum. Norris realized that the material was that of Beatty he had been expecting.[43] Baillie brought the manuscripts to

40. From a letter to Wilkinson dated July 16, 1946, whose author is not known: ". . . a British officer who was charged with the duty of investigating the whereabouts and present condition of works of art, etc., in Germany that come from Britain. The officer in question saw Forsdyke, and it was, I think, from Forsdyke that I got the most detailed information." References to Norris in this capacity recur in subsequent correspondence.

41. A letter of F. Francis, Secretary of the British Museum, to Wilkinson of July 25, 1946 reports this fact.

42. Wilkinson wrote Beatty on October 9, 1947, what Baillie (see also the following note) had reported (based on a rough memorandum also in the Chester Beatty Archives and dated the same day): "Dr. Ibscher handed the Papyri to a relative of his in Bavaria. (This corresponds more or less with what young Ibscher told Dr. Gardiner, i.e. that after old Ibscher's death, young Ibscher handed them to his father-in-law in Bavaria). This relation (i.e., apparently the father-in-law) handed the MSS. to the Fine Arts Repository which was established by the Americans last year, and they were held by the Americans together with other property which was to be sent back to the Allies, or other quarters."

43. Wilkinson's letter of October 9, 1947, to Beatty continued:

> About a week ago Mr. Baillie was in Munich, arranging for the transfer of some fine arts property from the American to the British Zone, and these two parcels were handed to Mr. Baillie. He was told by the Americans that they thought it was British Museum property, and that it had been handed over by Dr. Gardiner to Dr. Ibscher. They handed it over readily, and were satisfied that it had come to Germany before the War. Mr. Baillie brought the parcels

London[44] and delivered them on October 8, 1947, to Joan Kingsford Wood[45] of the staff of the Chester Beatty Library, who commented:[46]

> Evidently untouched and as they were when handed to Dr. Ibscher, as far as it is possible to tell.

Part of the London concern to recover the material had involved an effort to determine just how much and which material belonging to Beatty was in Germany. It turned out that no one actually knew; the only documentation that could be turned up referred only to two manuscripts, the parts of the Psalms and of the Homilies brought to London in April 1931 (see below).[47] Since this part of the Homilies back to his office in Düsseldorf, and informed Squadron-Leader Norris at the. Head Office; Norris recognized the parcels as your property about which I had had correspondence with him, i.e. Norris. Baillie was coming home on leave, and offered to bring the parcels to London himself. He had noticed that the Papyri, which he had opened, were very fragile.

44. Baillie's letter of October 5, 1947, to Beatty stated: "I have just brought over from Germany, on my return on leave, two codices, which I understand you sent to Dr. Ibscher of Berlin before the war. I collected them from Munich and it seemed the safest and quickest way of getting them back. Perhaps you would be good enough to let me know when it would be convenient for me to hand them over to you officially."

45. On October 8, 1947, Wood signed a receipt for "two parcels containing one labelled 'CODEX C' and the other 'MANICHEAN PSALM BOOKS.'"

46. Her note is not written on the receipt itself, but is handwritten by her on a letter of October 8, 1947 she received from John Wooderson, Beatty's secretary. In the note she refers to the "Psalm book "in the singular, thereby in effect correcting the receipt (see the preceding note).

47. On November 25, 1945,Wilkinson wrote Beatty asking "which MSS. were left with Ibscher." Beatty must have turned to Wood for information, for on November 28, 1945, she wrote him: "I have no note at all what Manichaean ms. or mss. were with Dr. Ibscher." The same day she wrote to Gardiner for assistance. On November 4, 1946, Wooderson wrote Wilkinson, asking him to inquire of Wood or Gardiner "exactly what were sent." Wilkinson talked to Wood, and on November 14, 1946, reported to Wooderson: "The MSS. were not, I should explain, dealt with by Mrs. Wood personally, in the first instance." She herself wrote Gardiner on November 14, 1946, "to ask if you happened to keep any note at all, of the number of Manichaean papyrus MSS. that were handed to Dr. Ibscher?"

He responded on November 16, 1946: "I am very sorry to say I cannot give you the information about the Manichaean papyri for which you ask. I never knew the number of rolls entrusted to Dr. Ibscher, but I believe his son to be perfectly honest and he will give Mr. Beatty the right information."

On November 16, 1946, she wrote to Wilkinson:

> There was one other source for details about the Mani MSS. which I fetched away yesterday morning, a day-book I used to keep. I found in it an entry

(like Part Two of the Psalms codex taken to Berlin the end of 1930) had long since been conserved, published, and returned to London, the only material that was actually identified as having gone to Germany and that was actually still in Germany was Part One of the Psalms codex. Overlooked were the materials in the Chester Beatty Library Archives (cited above) concerning Part Two of the Psalms codex being taken by Ibscher to Berlin at the end of May 1930, and the bulk of the Synaxeis codex and Volume Two of the Kephalaia being taken by Ibscher to Berlin—perhaps both November 27, 1930. Of the three items at Schondorf, the English team had been aware of only one as being in Germany. It is thus out of ignorance and oversight that the false conclusion was reached that everything had been returned from Germany.[48]

Inquiries were immediately begun as to who might be enlisted to conserve the two book blocks. No one in England could be recommended, but several recommended Rolf Ibscher. For this reason, and also no doubt in gratitude, Rolf Ibscher was offered employment to continue the conservation begun by his father. On May 27, 1948, he

for—

"May 8 1931 To Dr. Gardiner for Dr. Ibscher, the 2 Manichaean Coptic books, Hymns and Ritual Observances."

This is the only record I have found of ever having taken any Manichaean ms. in its original state to Dr. G.[ardiner] for Dr. I.[bscher]. The title 'Ritual Observances' may later have turned into 'Homilies' on examination? . . . As to whether these '2 Coptic books' later turned into 3 books, so-to-speak; or Mr. Beatty had one more afterwards, I cannot say.

This faint glimmer of awareness of there having been more than two that were turned over to Ibscher to conserve thus seems to have been dismissed. After the two codices had been returned from Germany, Wood appended a handwritten note to her file copy of her letter of November 28, 1945, to Beatty, to correct her comment to the effect that she had no notes about material going to Ibscher; she now quoted the note dated May 8, 1931, and added: "This date tallies fairly with that of 'April 1931,' written on one of the boxes returned Oct 8/47 from Munich." This must be the box containing the first part of the Psalms, since this was first brought to London April 1931 (see below) and was returned October 8, 1947.

48. Wilkinson wrote Wooderson on October 9, 1947: "the parcels appear to contain all the material which remained in Dr. Ibscher's hands. None of it has been mounted; it is still in its original condition. The two parcels contain (1) Codex C (2) The Psalm-books Papyri." In his letter the same day to Beatty, he also stated: "Further, a number of the mounted leaves marked 'Codex C,' at Baroda House, tally in size and appearance with the unmounted fragments of Codex C which have just arrived. The probability is, therefore, that we have got everything back at last."

wrote Beatty accepting the offer, and incidentally covered himself by blaming careless American soldiers for whatever damages may have been suffered by the codices.[49] In the argosy from the Neues Museum to the Zoo bunker and on to Kleinmachnow, to Schondorf, to Munich, to Düsseldorf, and to London, American personnel of the Fine Arts Repository were responsible only for the approximately one-hour trip from Schondorf to Munich. Fortunately, a placing of blame was apparently not necessary.

Rolf Ibscher maintained as late as 1954 that all of Beatty's material thus survived,[50] though only a year later he explained to Beatty that the Synaxeis codex was among those taken to Leningrad.[51]

The other museum objects still stored in the Zoo bunker were taken by the Soviet forces to the Soviet sector of Berlin, before the Soviet forces vacated that part of Berlin in which the Zoo Station is located, which became the British sector. The loot from the Zoo bunker was deposited temporarily in a Soviet command post at the Friedrichsfelde Castle in the Soviet sector, as was indicated by a few glassed papyrus leaves turned in to the museum by persons reporting they found them there.[52] The hoard was then transported by train to

49. Ibscher wrote in his wooden English: ". . . I am not knowing how are the manuscripts being kept by the foolish way of acting of the American Military Service arbitrary, contrary to my entreaty. [Ibscher was not even in Schondorf when the codices were turned in. See note 37 above.] Surely the manuscripts were not treated carefully during the travelling over hedge and ditch. But how could this be expected by any soldier having not the slightest notion of the delicate material keeping in his hands!"

50. Rolf Ibscher, "Wiederaufnahme," 3.

51. Rolf Ibscher reported in his limited English to Beatty in a letter of October 6, 1955:

> The papyri were removed according to my arrangement from the bomb proof shelter (Zoo Bunker) in 1944 by my assistant at the Museum, Mr. Seidel, but Codex B [Synaxeis], sorry to say, seems to have been left behind. The reason being that the papyri had to be removed secretly in a frantic hurry, thus you can imagine how glad I was, when Mr. Seidel got past the SS-Guards with the invaluable little wooden box . . .
> Thus Codex B [actually the Berlin codex P^{15998}, the Letters], together with 3 Berlin manuscripts [P^{15996}, P^{15997}, P^{15999}] and all other glazed [glassed] Berlin Manichaean Papyri of the Museum [P^{15995} and leaves of P^{15996}, P^{15997}, and P^{15998}] were taken to Russia.

52. Wolfgang Müller, director emeritus of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin, reported in 1986 that Rolf Ibscher told him this. Müller himself did not move to Berlin until 1951.

Leningrad in 1946 (see below) and in principle returned to Berlin in 1958. But none of the book blocks were returned.

Although Michel Tardieu has reported that the bulk of P^{15997} and P^{15998} had been "destroyed or lost during the Second World War,"[53] no evidence has emerged indicating any loss during the war, though the loss of the P^{15997} and P^{15998} book blocks (and of P^{15999}, the unconservable bulk of the Homilies that Tardieu overlooked) remains unexplained. Otto Firchow, director of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin at the time, moved to the British sector of Berlin in August 1960, and commended himself to the British as a refugee by reporting that he had brought with him Beatty's missing codex.[54] But when the package finally reached the British Museum in October 1960, it turned out to contain "only blank leaves of papyrus and a few inscribed fragments."[55] Firchow maintained that the packet had been "packed by Dr. Ibscher" and that he himself was not involved.[56]

On May 23, 1985, I visited the British Museum to go through the files left behind in the office of the retired conservator of papyrus Stanley Baker, and came upon what seemed to be the box turned in by Firchow. My inventory of this item reads:

53. Tardieu, "Les Manichéens en Égypte," 5–19, especially 6. With regard to his estimate of 1,000 lost leaves as "that which would have been lost in Berlin at the time of the events of the Second War," (7), he refers to Rolf Ibscher, "Mani und kein Ende," 223, who, however, does not here date the loss to the time during the war.

54. In a letter of August 29, 1960, Otto Firchow, replying to a letter from I. E. S. Edwards, who had written to him at the Papyrus Collection inquiring about Beatty's material, described his move as follows: "I myself have been compelled to surrender during the past few days under political and personal pressure the Direction of the Berlin Museum, Egyptian Department, and to flee to West Berlin. I have used this opportunity to take the Mani Papyri with me. In the next few days I will hand them over to the British Military Authorities."

Johannes Irmscher, at the time director of the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde of the Academy of Sciences of the German Democratic Republic entrusted with editing the Manichaean codices, has in a letter of March 27, 1989, interpreted Firchow's move as not a "Politicum," but merely as an effort to improve his situation.

55. In a letter to Beatty dated October 26, 1960, Edwards reported that the package had arrived the preceding Sunday, was opened on Monday, and had the contents as quoted above.

56. In a letter of October 28, 1960, from Firchow to Edwards.

> Flat wooden box. Contains vestiges of Mani codex without text. Sheets of paper presumably used in conservation contain German writing presumably by Ibscher.

There were in Baker's office also 15 large green folders containing remnants of the Mani material (as well as a German newspaper fragment dated May 15, 1931). I submitted the inventory to the director of the Chester Beatty Library, Wilfrid Lockwood, on May 26, 1985. On June 25, 1985, Lockwood wrote Giversen to the effect he might want to consult the items I had located at the British Museum. Giversen has identified the material turned in by Firchow as insignificant vestiges of the Psalms codex, which, however, Giversen did not include in the Facsimile Edition.[57] Perhaps it is from Part Two of the Psalms codex acquired March 23, 1930, since the box containing Part One of the Psalms acquired in April 1931 had already been returned to London in 1947 along with Part One of the Psalms (see note 47 above). Presumably Hugo Ibscher had not gone to the trouble to separate and put between glass what he considered insignificant unidentified vestiges (even though they may impress us as relatively large and numerous), but apparently had left them in the box in which the codex had been kept prior to its conservation.

57. Giversen, Psalm-Book. Part 1, vii, xi:

> Still remaining to be published are some fragmentary pages and small fragments of the Psalm Book which were entrusted to Hugo Ibscher for conservation by A. Chester Beatty in the 1930s. These remained unrestored at Ibscher's death in 1943 and in 1960 they were transferred to the British Museum by the German Egyptologist Otto Firchow.
> Since the material taken to the British Museum [actually only to the British Sector of Berlin] by Otto Firchow has not yet been conserved, it has not been included in this publication. It is to be hoped that the extremely difficult and tedious work of restoring this material will be carried out by a skilled expert.

It is apparently to this same situation that Giversen referred vaguely in his Lund essay, "The Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269:

> A few fragments and a couple of fragmentary pages also from the Psalm-Book, are not yet conservated as they were left in Hugo Ibschers [sic] home in Berlin. It cannot be doubted that they belong to the Chester Beatty effects but they were, in a strange way, brought to the British Museum in the 1960's.

> A now deceased scholar informed me some years ago that they were there, but since there are some problems attached to them I will not say more about them here.

Rolf Ibscher did not return the codex that he had kept in Schondorf to Berlin, to which he maintained it belonged, but rather, on his trips to and from London, worked at conserving the leaves while visiting his wife's family in Schondorf. Søren Giversen saw the material in Munich in 1955, by which time the West German authorities had taken control of the material.[58] He apparently did not identify it and presumably for that reason did not notify the Chester Beatty Library at the time. Carsten Colpe was engaged to edit it (from September 1, 1956, to November 30, 1957),[59] for which purpose it was moved to Göttingen. Böhlig was brought in as a consultant. In 1957 they noted running heads and chapter titles that identified the material as the Synaxeis codex.[60] Against this evidence, Rolf Ibscher's arguments that it must be the Berlin Letters codex P[15998] were in vain, and he ultimately somewhat grudgingly conceded the point.[61]

58. Mentioned by Giversen to P. Henchey, then librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, on May 8, 1980.

59. According to Carsten Colpe, in an interview on March 16, 1986.

60. Böhlig reported this discovery at the 24th International Orientalists' Congress in Munich in 1957. Böhlig published a summary, "Zu den Synaxeis des Lebendigen Evangeliums," 229–30. The full text was published in Mysterion und Wahrheit, 222–27, where Colpe's concurrence in this conclusion is expressly stated: "Thus one can assume, as C. Colpe also thinks, that the remainder of a Berlin codex discussed by C. Schmidt [P[15995]] forms with this codex a content unity, but no unity in terms of ownership."

Regarding Böhlig's views on the Synaxeis codex, see also Böhlig, "Synaxies = Homilia?" 485–86, "Die Arbeit," and Mysterion und Wahrheit, 186, for the identification of the Synaxeis codex.

61. Rolf Ibscher, "Der Mani-Fund," 227, referred to the codex as "for the time being the only Mani manuscript that remains to Germany." He combined this claim with the concession that the codex was the Synaxeis by appeal to the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis that Schmidt had acquired for Berlin and that were inventoried as P[15995]:

> . . . our so-called Schondorf manuscript from the Berlin Museum holdings, and hence now stationed in Göttingen, does not contain the corpus of Mani's letters, as was assumed at first. Quite clearly however . . . it belongs . . . to the codex that was entered by my father still, with 31 leaves, under the old Berlin catalogue number 15995. That is to say, my father began among the Berlin holdings with the conservation of this codex, and then deferred further work on it in favor of the more important Kephalaia manuscript that bears the number 15996.

This special pleading ignores the fact that P[15995], according to the Inventory Book, consists only of 31 leaves, which is all that Schmidt purchased for Berlin. The rest of the codex had already been acquired by Beatty. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, make this clear:

Colpe gave up the editing assignment as hardly possible and called for a suspension of further conservation of individual leaves until that process could be accompanied by photographic documentation of each stage, which in effect brought the conservation to an end in 1957.[62] This termination of the funding and of the work could also have to do with the recognition that it had to do with property that did not belong to Germany. Rolf Ibscher died February 5, 1967.

As a result of the transport of Egyptological artifacts stored in West Germany to West Berlin from Celle in 1957 and from Wiesbaden in 1958, the creation of an Egyptological Section there in 1962, and the opening of the Egyptian Museum in Berlin-Charlottenburg in 1967, the conserved leaves and book block that Rolf Ibscher had not lived to finish conserving were deposited there.

In 1985 William Brashear, the curator of the Papyrus Collection of the Egyptian Museum of Berlin-Charlottenburg, asked me to provide whatever information I could about this material there in storage (of which the present report is the outcome), and to activate interest in it. On November 18, 1985, Joachim Karig, acting director of the Egyptian Museum, wrote me that he had consulted with the general director of the State Museums, Prof. Dube, and his representative, the director of the Antiques Museum, Prof. Heilmeyer, and they approved my request, made orally August 2, 1985, and in writing October 5, 1985, for authorization to enlist scholars to prepare an edition. Similar discussions with Dr. Wolfgang Müller, director of the Egyptian Museum and Papyrus Collection, and with Dr. Gisela Holan, first representative of the general director of the State Museums of Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR, led to a letter of authorization of August 14, 1987, from Müller, granting "approval for the scholarly work on > . . . a collection of 31 leaves that have been brought under glass, which were acquired in the Fayyum and without doubt belong to the London Mani pieces.

Ibscher made the same erroneous inference in his report, "Über den Stand," 50–64, especially 60. The meeting at which the paper was presented took place on December 14–15, 1964. Thus he never surrendered the claim to German ownership, upon which he no doubt considered his chances of employment as conservator depended, since by this time his working relationship with Beatty had dissolved.

62. Ibscher held Colpe thus responsible for terminating the conservation, "Über den Stand," 60. But in fact Colpe thus rescued something for more sophisticated procedures than those of Rolf Ibscher, if in fact such can be at least hoped for from the future.

and editing of the Coptic Mani texts of our Papyrus Collection according to the shared oral discussions." Wilfrid Lockwood, librarian and director of the Chester Beatty Library, who was kept abreast of the developments from 1985 on, also expressed himself willing to participate in such a cooperative plan, in such a way as to respect the commitment the Library had under his predecessor made with Søren Giversen (see below). I wrote Giversen proposing such cooperation on October 21, 1985 but received no reply.

I had invited scholars to participate, in announcements made at the 121st annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature in Anaheim, California, on October 19, 1985, at a conference of the Fachkommission Byzantinistik of the Historiker-Gesellschaft of the German Democratic Republic in Halle on February 21, 1986, at a conference of the Association Francophone de Coptologie at the Louvre in Paris on May 23, 1986, at the Second International Conference on Manichaeism in Bonn on August 9, 1989, and at the 18th International Congress of Byzantine Studies in Moscow on August 8–15, 1991.

During a sabbatical semester in Berlin the first half of 1986, I inventoried and organized for study the Manichaean material, and wrote the bulk of an extensive report, published below, of which the present paper is a summary. With regard to the Synaxeis codex, there are 125 conserved leaves (plus 5 glass frames of fragments) in Berlin-Charlottenburg, plus the remainder of the book block, where one page is exposed, making a total of 251 available pages that when added to the 31 leaves or 62 pages in East Berlin, makes a total of 156 conserved leaves and 313 accessible pages, with about 100 to 120 leaves unconserved in the book block.[63] The amount of legible ink is appallingly small, and the amount of text that can be recovered correspondingly minimal. Transcription efforts have been undertaken in West Berlin by Karen King, Stephen Patterson, Paul Allan Mirecki, and Wolf-Peter Funk. And 10 leaves were on loan for study in California from 1986 to 1988, where transcription work was done by Harold W. Attridge, Charles A. Bobertz, and Gesine Robinson, and in addition by Funk and Patterson. In 1988 these leaves were returned to Berlin, when 9 others plus 2 of the original leaves were brought to California for study; they were returned to Berlin the summer of 1989. In 1989 five further leaves were brought to America and returned in 1991. Nothing from this Berlin-Charlottenburg part of the Synaxeis codex has been published, except transcriptions of ten chapters or Synaxis titles by Paul Allan Mirecki,[64] and English translations of some phrases and sentences prepared by Wolf-Peter Funk are being published.[65]

63. Ibscher estimated this number remaining in the book block after his work had come to an end, "Über den Stand," 60.

The material brought to California was photographed by Bruce Zuckerman, director of the West Semitic Research Project of the University of Southern California, and his brother, Kenneth, a professional photographer. They photographed the bulk of the material in Berlin from July through August 1991. They are already well known for their success in the photography of otherwise hardly legible sections of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The results of their photography seem very promising. This will be even more the case if the computer enhancement technology that is already available to them can be enlisted in this project. This involves what is called a microdensitometer: A photographic negative is scanned in units (called picture elements) as small as 5 microns (i.e., five thousandths of a millimeter), each of which is assigned a number in terms of its shade of gray, with more than a thousand grades of gray to choose from (the human eye can distinguish only some 22 shades). These numbers can then be entered into the computer so as to project the image on the screen. Then the numbers derived from the shades of gray can be changed at will, e.g., reducing the number of all picture elements with a shade of gray below a certain number, thus lightening the light gray, and increasing the number of all picture elements with a shade of gray above a certain number, thus darkening the dark gray—from which a picture of much higher contrast results. Or the shades of gray can be assigned any color or shade of color, which is a promising alternative, given the ability of the eye to detect more distinctions among colors and their shades than among shades of gray. And the picture can be enlarged on the screen at will, producing the added effect of microscopic examination. A demonstration by the Perkin-Elmer firm of Pomona, California, at the Ancient Biblical Manuscript Center in Claremont

64. Mirecki, "Coptic Manichaean Synaxeis Codex," 135–45, has transcribed and translated what remains of thirteen chapter or Synaxis titles, ten from the material in Berlin-Charlottenburg, three from the material in Berlin-Hauptstadt der DDR.

65. Funk has translated a number of phrases and sentences that he and other members of the Mani team transcribed. Karen King quoted these translations in King, "Progress Report."

on May 19, 1989, indicates that the technology is already functional, though still prohibitively expensive.

Chester Beatty Library Codex C, Volume Two of the Kephalaia

Schmidt reported that the Fayyumic dealer had sold all three of his parts of the discovery to Beatty. As in the case of the Synaxeis, no definite reference to the acquisition of this codex has been located in the Dublin Archives, and yet one may assume that this material was acquired from the Fayyumic dealer. For since the Psalms and the Homilies may more probably have come from Nahman (see below), one may assume by the process of elimination that Volume 2 of the Kephalaia is from the Fayyumic dealer.[66] Since Schmidt talked to this dealer only in the spring of 1931, Beatty's acquisitions from him must have been earlier than that date.

In 1986 Søren Giversen published in the Facsimile Edition photographic reproductions of Volume 2 of the Kephalaia.[67] Though publication of a facsimile edition puts the facsimiles in the public domain, publication rights for an editio princeps are to be awarded by a committee consisting of Søren Giversen, president, Rodolphe Kasser, and Martin Krause.[68] Kasser was supposed to take administrative responsibility for editing this codex, but plans to involve Wolf-Peter Funk did not receive Giversen's approval.

In the Crum Archives (see below) there is a transcription (Crum Mss 11.30.10) of the page reproduced on plate 341 of the Facsimile Edition.

Chester Beatty Library Codex A, the Psalms, Part One

In April 1931 Beatty brought from Egypt two further Manichaean manuscripts and three wooden covers (i.e., three front or back covers, out of an original total of fourteen such covers). The covers are at the Chester Beatty Library in a large envelope, on which is written:

66. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," ix, has referred to Beatty's acquiring three books "in the Cairo antiquities market" "in the year 1930," but this may have not been meant in any more precise sense than to say that beginning in 1930 he had been buying Manichaean texts in Egypt, i.e., the location may not have been intended to be any more precise than the inexact date.

67. Giversen, Kephalaia, facsimile edition.

"Purchased Spring 1931." Apparently, these are the only covers still extant today, since those that Beatty acquired in 1930, and those of P^{15997} that Schmidt acquired in 1931 cannot be located at the Chester Beatty Library or at the Berlin Egyptian Museum.

No documentation has been located as to the dealer (or dealers) from whom Beatty acquired this material. The Fayyumic dealer is reported to have had three of the eight parts, and to have sold all his holdings to Beatty (except the scraps of P^{15995} removed to make the codex look clean for Beatty—a codex that Schmidt subsequently acquired). Since only seven codices were involved in the discovery, one must assume that one codex had been divided. If the initially divided codex had belonged to the Fayyumic dealer, then in selling his three parts to Beatty he would in fact have only sold two codices, presumably the bulk of the Synaxeis in two parts, and Volume Two of the Kephalaia (see above). Thus the report that Beatty acquired three units from the Fayyumic dealer does not require that one postulate that he acquired Part One of the Psalms from that dealer. It may be more probable that he acquired it from Nahman, from whom he had acquired the other part a year earlier.

The "good manners" of leading Cairo antiquities dealers has to do with the fact that they have a vested interest in the goodwill of a regular client. Some such manners may be suspected in the case of Nahman. For he showed Volume 1 of the Kephalaia to Schmidt early in 1930 when Schmidt was on his way to Jerusalem, and, even though Schmidt did not acquire it then, Nahman did not proceed to sell it to Beatty shortly thereafter, when Nahman offered Beatty parts of other codices that Beatty took on approval. Thus Nahman was careful to offer Beatty other codices than what he had offered Schmidt, thereby avoiding offending Schmidt but, by informing him of Beatty's acquisitions (without making clear to Schmidt that they had only been taken on approval), also making clear to him that these were fast-selling items of which he should take advantage. Schmidt did in fact concede that Beatty's decision to acquire the material was one factor in persuading him on his return trip from Jerusalem, in spite of a lack of funding, to go ahead with the purchase of the Kephalaia. On subsequent trips he acquired other parts of the same codex—acquisitions that indicated the continuing practice, to which Schmidt referred, of subdividing codices to increase their value, making a total of seven units of the one Kephalaia codex (see below), none of which seems to have been offered in the meantime to Beatty. It would have been in keeping with such an enlightened policy of self-interest that Nahman, having turned over to Beatty part of the Psalms codex and part of the Homilies codex in 1930, did not offer these to Schmidt, but held them for Beatty to acquire in 1931. Whereas Schmidt portrayed Nahman as "rejecting" Beatty after Schmidt got to him (see below), this fits much better the impression Nahman would have wanted to leave with Schmidt than the documented reality of his continuing business relationships with Beatty.

One of the two manuscripts brought to London in April 1931 was at the time designated "Manichaean Hymns" or "Manichaean MS. (Hymns) Psalms. Codex A,"[69] obviously the first and major part of the Psalms codex, of which Beatty had acquired the smaller concluding part the preceding year (see above).

Schmidt was eager to have access to the whole discovery. Ibscher informally broached in London cooperative procedures that Schmidt had envisaged; these procedures were incorporated in a letter of May 7, 1931, from Sir Alan Gardiner to his friend of long standing, Wilhelm Schubart, director of the Berlin Papyrus Collection. Beatty had initially sought to enlist his Egyptological friend Sir Alan H. Gardiner as his consultant and potential English coeditor. But Gardiner did not want to undertake such a large Coptic assignment, nor could Walter Ewing Crum, who was engrossed with completing his Coptic Dictionary. Hence Sir Herbert Thompson was settled upon as the British scholar to represent Beatty. On June 11, 1931, Thompson met with Schmidt in London, and they agreed formally on such a cooperative procedure:[70] Just as Ibscher had already been entrusted with conserving in Berlin

69. A two-ring binder that served as a kind of accessions book in the early years, now in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library, lists for April 1931 Cairo "Manichaean Hymns," "Manichaean Ritual—Laws," "3 wooden covers." The black loose-leaf folder entitled "Papyrus: Biblical Manichaean Hieratic Greek etc. General Catalogue," in the section "Manichaean Pap.," p. 5ff., contains "DETAILS of when MANICHAEAN PAPYRUS were received and sent to Dr. Ibscher, for mounting." The first entry, dated April 1931, notes: "Brought by Mr. Beatty from Egypt," and itemizes: "Manichaean MS. (Hymns) Psalms. Codex A. With Dr. Ibscher. May 8, 1931." "Manichaean Ms. Ritual Laws. With Dr. Ibscher. May 8, 1931." "3 Covers." P. 6 reports "Entries from Day-Book." The first, dated May 8, 1931, reads: "To Dr. G.[ardiner] for Dr. I.[bscher] The 2 Mani Coptic books. Hymns and Ritual Observances."

70. Documented in letters of June 15, 1931, from Thompson to Beatty; of June 27, 1931, from Gardiner to Beatty, and of April 3, 1932, from Thompson to Beatty.

both collections, H. J. Polotsky would be entrusted with transcribing and translating the material in Berlin as it was conserved. He would be under the supervision of Schmidt and Thompson, to both of whom copies of his work on both the Berlin and London parts would be regularly sent, to be translated by Thompson into English and distributed to Crum (for the Coptic Dictionary) and to Beatty. Polotsky's work and salary would be divided equally between Berlin and London. As the leaves were conserved and transcribed, those belonging to Beatty would be brought back to London, usually by Ibscher on his annual London trips to conserve other materials owned by Beatty, but, as it turned out, at times also by C. R. C. Allberry, and once by Beatty himself.

Thompson was concerned that Beatty's codices be published in England, where he would be primarily involved. But on February 6, 1932, Schmidt wrote Thompson proposing that some of Polotsky's transcriptions and translations of material belonging to Beatty be published in the forthcoming essay for the Prussian Academy. Thompson appealed to Beatty to block what he considered to be a serious breach of the agreement. Beatty wrote Schmidt on March 21, 1932, forbidding him the right of even mentioning his codices in print. And on April 16, 1932, Beatty wrote Ibscher to stop all conservation work on his codices until the matter could be discussed on his forthcoming visit to London.

Thompson protested to Beatty on April 3, 1932, that terminating the arrangement completely would violate the valid agreements that had been made, which would be especially unfortunate with regard to Polotsky, whose high quality was recognized and whose livelihood depended largely upon this work.[71] Yet on May 2, 1932, Beatty wrote Thompson that "very difficult business conditions" made it necessary for him to terminate the arrangement, though some phase-out for Polotsky should be arranged. Polotsky was then instructed to concentrate his work for Beatty on the one manuscript nearest to completion, 71. Thompson wrote Beatty: "He is an extremely learned and able young man; but he is not a naturalized German (being a Russian) and hence has no prospect of an official or University post; and has to make a living. I believe he has nothing but these 270Rm. (orig. 300Rm.) per month, i.e., at par £180 p. ann." The letter explains that the ten percent reduction had been a German reduction of all salaries effective the first of that year. The Prussian Academy paid half the salary, and Beatty paid the other half.

the Homilies, with his salary terminating the end of May 1932. He was given until the end of June 1933 to edit it, with the right then to publish it in German, at no expense to Beatty, in Germany.[72] Thus Thompson's role, based on his assumption of an English edition, came abruptly to an end. The result was Polotsky's publication of the Homilies in 1934.[73]

The decisions not to acquire part of the Homilies and to terminate work on the Manichaean material, both of which were made by Beatty in the spring of 1932, seem to relate to each other in the sense that Beatty had decided not to engage further in the Manichaean venture. But he did later relent in part, permitting Schmidt and Polotsky in their article for the Prussian Academy to summarize Beatty's material though not to quote it. With regard to Ibscher, Beatty continued to use his valuable services to conserve his Manichaean and other papyrus holdings. Yet already on May 1, 1932, Thompson had quit in protest over Beatty's procedures, a move which facilitated the decision to permit Polotsky to publish in German. To judge by the exchange of correspondence, Beatty had really never fully accepted Thompson to replace his friend Gardiner as his representative in such negotiations.

The transcriptions and translations from various codices that Polotsky sent to Thompson for Beatty and Crum during this period of about a year of active collaboration are preserved at least in part in the Archives of the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin and in the Crum Archives at the Griffith Institute in the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford. The copies that Polotsky provided to Schmidt (and later some that Alexander Böhlig provided) were preserved by the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin. In view of the fact that what has survived is considerably less legible than it must have been half a century ago, and in view of the unusually high quality of Polotsky's work, these transcriptions and translations, a number of which were never 72. Documented in a memorandum of a conference between Beatty and Gardiner on May 8, 1932, and letters of May 12, 1932, from Gardiner to Beatty, May 13, 1932, from Beatty to Gardiner, May 20, 1932, from Beatty to Thompson, and May 24, 1932, from Thompson to Beatty. Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has speculated that Polotsky's learning in the spring of 1932 that he would lose this employment may have led him already then to begin inquiries regarding a position at Hebrew University in Jerusalem to which he moved in the spring of 1933, in view of the fact that the kind of salary paid by the Prussian Academy was not in itself a living wage, as Böhlig, his successor, himself experienced.

published, are among the most important material to have survived the tragic postwar story of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi.

In the Crum Archive are copies of Polotsky's transcriptions from Part One of the Psalms, corresponding to the facsimile edition, Volume 3 (see note 78 below), plates 140, 161, 162, 243, 313, and 314.

On June 16, 1980, Søren Giversen applied to the Chester Beatty Library for permission to publish their Manichaean papyri, both for a facsimile edition and for a critical edition. The Trustees granted permission on June 26, 1980.[74] On November 24, 1982, Giversen applied for permission to have about 171 leaves sent on loan to Denmark. On January 14, 1984, 184 leaves (his original request plus the 13 Synaxeis leaves, see above) were deposited at the Royal Library in Copenhagen.

On December 11, 1980, the librarian of the Chester Beatty Library at the time, Patrick Henchy, offered Giversen access to two files, one titled "Berlin Manichaean Papyrus Transcriptions," "From Sir H. Thompson July 1931 to May 18, 1932," obviously the transcriptions Polotsky had sent Thompson to pass on to Beatty during that time (see above); the other "A. Chester Beatty Manichaean Papyrus Codex A and B Translations," presumably Polotsky's translations and the English translations Thompson prepared for Beatty.

In 1984 Giversen presented, at the International Symposium on the Cologne Mani Codex, English translations of Psalms 136 and 119 that were published in 1986; and at the First International Conference on Manichaeism in 1987, he presented a Coptic transcription of the title and opening eight lines of Psalm 119 that was published in 1988. In the published form of the first speech, Giversen introduced his translation of Psalm 136 with a comment that apparently should actually have introduced Psalm 119, where the comment had in fact stood in the earlier transcript of his 1984 speech:[75]

74. Patrick Henchy, the librarian at the time, communicated this to Giversen on June 26, 1980.

75. Giversen, "Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 371–80, especially 376. Though in the published essay this statement comes immediately before the English translation of Psalm 136, this cannot be its correct place. For the opening of lines 30–33 in Giversen's translation of Psalm 136 is intact without lacunae, whereas Giversen's comment calls attention to something that has "gone lost." Furthermore Giversen had submitted to the trustees of the Chester Beatty Library on November 23, 1982, as a sample of his work, the transcription and translation of this same page, where lines 30–33 in his Coptic transcription have no lacunae at all. And there are no lacunae here in the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 189, where the text is unusually

> From the notes and decipherment from 1931 I can see, that something has gone lost since then, especially at the beginning of lines 30–34.

Polotsky's name was not mentioned in connection with the reference to material of 1931, which was not clarified beyond the cryptic expression "notes and decipherment." In discussion during the 1989 conference at Bonn, Giversen explained that he had referred by name to Thompson and Polotsky, but that due to a typesetter's error, the names had fallen out; when I drew to his attention that in the typescript of his paper he had sent me prior to publication, the names were also absent, he said this must be due to a typist's error.

The publication of 1988 that contained the Coptic transcription made no reference to Polotsky's work at all. Polotsky had in 1931–1932 provided a Coptic transcription, a German translation, and notes to Psalm 119, each page of which concludes with his distinctive abbreviation of his name, "P-y." Since copies of Polotsky's transcriptions and translations were also forwarded by Thompson to Walter Ewing Crum, they are preserved in the Crum Archives in the Griffith Institution of the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford, where, according to records on file there, Giversen worked in August 1981.[76] Indeed Giversen's comment in 1986 in introducing his translation of Psalm 119 ("in fact it is possible that a new Psalm begins on page b, but unfortunately the upper part is almost illegible") would seem to reflect not only Polotsky's designation of the pages as a and b, but also his comment at the legible. In fact, in the typescript of Giversen's lecture of 1984, the statement about the lacunae at the opening of lines 30–33 occurs immediately before the second English translation he presented—that of Psalm 119—where indeed the opening of the lines numbered 30–32 of his translation begins with lacunae, then with illegible material and a lacuna at the end of the English translation of line 33, as on p. 379 of the published lecture. In the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 162, the bottom left corner of the leaf (including text) is not extant. Thus one must assume that the statement has in view Psalm 119, rather than Psalm 136. Giversen confirmed this conjecture at the 1989 conference in Bonn.

76. In the Crum Archive, Polotsky's transcription and German translation of Psalm 119 occur on two pages each, since the Psalm straddles two pages of the codex. The first (Crum Mss 11.30.2 for the Coptic, Crum Mss 11.28.85 = Crum Mss 11.28.7 for the German = Facsimile Edition, Volume 3 [see note 78 below], plate 161) contains the first 8 lines of the chapter, which Giversen designates as "a." The second (Crum Mss 11.30.3 for the Coptic, Crum Mss 11.28.86 = Crum Ms 11.28.8 for the German = Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plate 162) corresponds to what Giversen designates as "b," which ends with line 33. In Polotsky's Coptic transcription there are lacunae at the opening of lines 30–33.

opening of the second page: "[Beginning of new hymn]," since hardly more than the illegibility of the opening lines suggests this alternative. Indeed Giversen apparently later reached a quite different view on this point from that of Polotsky, for the Facsimile Edition, Volume 3, plates 162 no longer considers this page as Psalm 119, lines 9–33 (or as Psalm 120, lines 1–25), but rather has the note: "[Incipit psalmus XII in linea 13.]"

The Coptic transcription of the title and opening eight lines of Psalm 119 that Giversen published in 1988 agree completely (except for dots under a few letters on two lines) with the work produced but not published by Polotsky in 1931.[77] This is particularly striking in the case of the eighth, the last line on the page, which reads identically in Polotsky's and Giversen's transcriptions.

The facsimile published in the Facsimile Edition, Volume III, Plate 161, shows that this last line of the page is almost completely illegible, with perhaps three or four letters that with great difficulty could be read, a few dots of ink that could be taken to be any letter, and lacunae in the bulk of the line. Yet Giversen's transcription is complete except for three letters restored in square brackets and two letters dotted, just as in Polotsky's. This transcription could not possibly be derived from the papyrus in its present condition. It is hence hard to avoid the inference that it derives from the transcription of Polotsky, obviously made at a time when more of the papyrus was extant, perhaps even before the leaf was removed from the book block. This is in a different way suggested also in the case of lines 30–33, where Giversen had commented "that something has gone lost since then [1931], especially at the beginning of lines 30–33," since his own translation does not have more lacunae than Polotsky's transcription and translation, whereas the published facsimile does indeed indicate that much less is now legible on these four lines than is present in Polotsky's transcription and in Giversen's translation.[78]

In the discussion at Bonn in 1989, Giversen explained that though he had worked in the Crum Archive more than once and had made use of Polotsky's transcription, this did not need to be mentioned in his article, since Giversen was not presenting a critical edition. He explained further that with the help of a microscope, he had been able to detect vestiges of ink from the top of the letters (the bulk of which are now in lacunae) that could fit the letters that Polotsky had read. Thus he could concur with Polotsky, though with dots under all these letters, though the dots disappeared due to typesetting errors—except for the two dots that are present, which happen to agree with those of Polotsky,—just as a typesetting error misplaced a diaeresis in another line.

Giversen published photographic reproductions of this major part of the Psalms codex in 1988, as volume 3 of the Facsimile Edition.[79] Publication rights for an editio princeps were to be awarded by the committee consisting of Søren Giversen, president; Rodolphe Kasser; and Martin Krause.

Chester Beatty Library Codex D, the Homilies

The other manuscript that Beatty brought from Cairo to London in April 1931 is designated in the Chester Beatty Archives as "Ritual Laws," and "Ritual Observances" (see above), though it apparently was a minor part of the Homilies codex—the major part of which (Berlin's P[15999]) Beatty had acquired with an option to buy in 1930, an option that he decided in 1932 not to exercise (see below). Presumably Beatty did not realize that what he decided not to buy in 1932 as unconservable was part of the same codex that he had bought in 1931 and had [rejoicing to the agony; we have contended with our enemies; [ ] us, our God, that you will not abandon us. [ ] have we received. You know, O Lord, that all our friends and our enemies . . .

79. Wood also suggested this identification in a letter of November 16, 1946 to Wilkinson (see note 44): "The title 'Ritual Observances' may later have turned into 'Homilies' on examination?"

Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," ix, confirmed the identification of the text acquired in 1931 with the Homilies: "The Mani text published here lay as a shapeless mass along with the Psalm Book when Mr. A. Chester Beatty turned this over to me in London to work on."

Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has suggested that the designation "ritual laws" or "ritual observances" may have been due to the subscript title of the first text in the Homilies reading (7,7) "The Sermon of the Prayer Is Completed."

already paid to have conserved and edited. In view of the fact that the major part of this codex had been obtained on approval in 1930 from Nahman, one may assume that it was Nahman who sold Beatty the other part in 1931, perhaps in hopes thus to move Beatty actually to complete the transaction for the first part (whose price had already been reduced in 1930 from £700 to the same level of £500 that Beatty had paid in 1930 for part of the Psalms codex).

H. J. Polotsky has published this part of the codex, the first text from this discovery to be published.[80]

In 1987 Søren Giversen published photographic reproductions of the Homilies as Volume 2 of the Facsimile Edition.[81]

CARL SCHMIDT'S ACQUISITIONS

One may now turn to the 5 holdings (three codices and parts of two others) in the Papyrus Collection of the State Museums of Berlin that were acquired by Carl Schmidt in a series of transactions from 1930 to 1932.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15995}, 31 leaves of the Synaxeis

Schmidt reported that in the spring of 1931 he had acquired in the Fayyum for the sake of completeness the remains of a codex, the bulk of which Beatty had already acquired, and that from this jumble 31 leaves could be conserved. This must be the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis codex in the Papyrus Collection of Berlin, inventoried as P^{15995}, since the only other codex shared between Beatty and Berlin was the Homilies codex, the Berlin part of which (P^{15999}) was acquired from Nahman after Beatty had released his option (see below). The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of the Berlin Museum's records in Wilhelm Schubart's hand concerning P^{15995} (and also concerning P$^{15996–8}$): "Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." These 31 leaves were taken with the other Berlin Museum holdings in 1946 to Leningrad, to be returned to Berlin with the other material in 1958 (see above). They went together with the other glassed Manichaean leaves in the Storage of the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin. Gesine Robinson prepared two draft transcriptions of the 62 pages in 1985 and 1986, but nothing has been published, except for three titles included among those that Paul Mirecki published.[82] The quality of the leaves varies considerably, but, as in the other cases, the amount of retrievable text is much less than the number of extant pages might lead one to expect.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P15996, Volume One of the Kephalaia

It was part of this codex that had been shown first to Carl Schmidt early in 1930 in Cairo, which he was able to identify from Epiphanius's reference to it. Schmidt, in transit to Jerusalem, did not acquire it, but on his return trip through Cairo he acquired it on credit. On his second trip early in 1931 and on his last visit to Cairo in the spring of 1932, Schmidt was shown each time two further lots, apparently from the same codex, which he also acquired.[83] Ultimately, Hugo Ibscher listed a total of 7 acquisitions by Schmidt of parts of this one codex.[84] A Prof. Grohmann of Prague acquired vestiges from the missing pages 311–30 for the Austrian National Library.[85]

82. See note 64 above.

83. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 7–8.

84. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," vi-vii:

> Hence the Kephalaia did not come to Berlin in one volume, but in two larger packets and five weaker layers. All of course nicely jumbled! . . . Purchase I is now pp. 1–18. Purchase II is now pp. 19–310. Purchase III is now pp. 331–56. Purchase IV is now pp. 357–76. Purchase V is now pp. 377–94. Purchase VI is now pp. 395–414. Purchase VII is now pp. 421 to the end.

What survived of the missing segment pages 415–20 are described as "paltry remains," "which can hardly be identified." What was considered the last extant leaf, though lacking pagination, was identified with the help of the chapter number 200 as being pages 501/502. A fragment with the pagination 514 stuck to this leaf indicates that the codex originally continued beyond the last extant leaf. Wolf-Peter Funk examined on August 11, 1986, the Warsaw leaf labeled pages 499/500 and detected there a chapter number in the 200s, which would require a pagination in the 500s, thus putting in question whether what was considered the last extant leaf is pages 501/502.

85. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 8 n. 1. This material, forwarded from Vienna to Berlin for Ibscher to conserve , and then returned to Vienna (Kephalaia, 1. Hälfte, vii), is in four glass containers with the inventory number K 11010. Remains of three leaves labeled pages 311–16, but perhaps more likely pages 313–16, 319–20, have been identified, together with a dozen unidentified fragments. Schmidt and Polotsky refer only to fragments of two leaves having been "rescued," no doubt since the third is no more than a larger fragment hardly deserving the designation leaf. After World War II five of the Berlin Kephalaia leaves emerged in Warsaw, presumably the result of the looting of trains taking Berlin Museum holdings to Leningrad in 1946. Lothar Berfelde,[86] founder of the Gründerzeit Museum of turn-of-the-century furniture now in Mahlsdorf near Berlin, had lived for a brief time in the Friedrichsfelde Castle (with whose previous owners he was distantly related), after it was no longer used as a Soviet command post. During the period in which it was a command post (spring 1945 to spring 1946), he recalled libraries being stored there awaiting shipment to the Soviet Union, though he did not know the specific contents of the crates. German crews, even after the war, manned the trains from Germany through Poland (though different gauge tracks at the border to the Soviet Union called there for different trains and crews). Berfelde reported that a friend since childhood, who worked for the German railroads, told him that in the countryside Poles would stop these trains, disconnect the engine, and make the German crews drive away in the engine, leaving the freight cars in the fields unattended, for the Poles to loot.

Wincenty Myszor reported on July 14, 1986, concerning these leaves:

> The Manichaean manuscripts that are now in Warsaw surfaced shortly after the last war under not fully clarified circumstances. One always speaks about a place Brodnica, near Toruń (Thorn) . . . The plates are said to have been at first in a private collection, then in some way (bought? acquired?) reached Prof. J. Manteuffel, the leader of the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University; he turned over a part of the manuscripts to the National Museum as a deposit. There are also rumors according to which the plates in the National Museum came directly from Brodnica to Warsaw, to Prof. Michalowski. Prof. J. Manteuffel and Prof. K. Michalowski wanted to return the leaves to Berlin. This did not succeed. In the '60s this matter is said to have almost landed in the Ministry.

Thus far H. J . Polotsky and Alexander Böhlig have published pp. 1–292 of the Kephalaia.[87] Of these, only pages 35/36 and 61/62 are missing from the boxes containing pp. 1–440.

Kephalaia," 53–55, gives a more detailed report.

86. Lothar Berfelde was interviewed on April 18, 1986, in Mahlsdorf and East Berlin.

87. Polotsky and Böhlig, Kephalaia (Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen

In Vienna there are three unpublished leaves, labeled pp. 311–316 (though they may be pages 313–16, 319–20, see note 85), as well as fragments.

In Warsaw there are five unpublished leaves, labeled pp. 447–54, 499–500. The pagination assigned to the last leaf may be inaccurate, since Wolf-Peter Funk has detected on it a chapter number beyond 200, which would require pagination in the 500s.

In Berlin 120 unpublished pages are in boxes: pages 293–310, 331–82, 387–414, 417–18, 421–40. Pages 455–56 are also present, making a total of 122 unpublished pages (61 leaves) that have been assigned pagination.

All that remains of pages 311–30 is in Vienna (see above). The absence of pp. 383–86, 415–16, and 419–20 is noted on cards in the relevant boxes in the hand of Rolf Ibscher's assistant, Otto Werner Luke. Since only the bottom half of pages 417–18 is extant, it is possible that it may be part of pages 413–14, of which only the top half is extant; the alignment of vertical fibers is inconclusive.

There are also 30 plates numbered not by pagination but by plate, 1–30, and 2 plates listed as "Kephalaia without number." Since item 23 is more a group of fragments than a leaf, there would be a total of Museen Berlin), herausgegeben im Auftrage der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften unter Leitung von Prof. Carl Schmidt, 1. Hälfte (Lieferung 1–10): v–xiv, "Die Handschrift," by Hugo Ibscher; pp. 1–102 by Polotsky, and pp. 103–244, 20 by Böhlig, according to p. iv (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1940). Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, has confirmed that there were no draft transcriptions or translations by Polotsky of pp. 103ff. on which Böhlig's work was based, but that Böhlig edited them alone. Böhlig, Kephalaia (Manichäische Handschriften der Staatlichen Museen Berlin), herausgegeben im Auftrage der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, zweite Hälfte (Lieferungen 11-12 = Coptic pages 244, 21–291) (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1966). Concerning the publication of these pages one may note the comment in the Jahrbuch der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Jahrgang 1942 (Berlin: Akademie, 1943), 66–67 (see also n. 90 below):

> Since Dr. Böhlig was enlisted in the army from x 41 on, the first double fascicle of the second volume of the Kephalaia could not yet be completed, although already 4 quires had been sent in to the publisher ready to print. Besides, the printing house has been limited by the lack of specialists. But it hopes in a while to be able again to take up the work on the Kephalaia. In the second half of August work could begin again on the reading of quires 5 and 6. It was possible to improve them materially. But as a result of the bad condition of preservation, the manuscript could not be finally completed.

Böhlig has also published p. 292, "Ja und Amen in manichäischer Deutung," 59–70, reprinted in his Gnosis und Synkretismus 2:638–53, especially 2:640–41.

31 plates without assigned pagination but labeled as belonging to the Kephalaia. But since plate 30 contains 2 leaves, the figure rises again to 32 unpublished leaves numbered by leaf rather than by an assigned pagination.

The last reported page is page 501–2, but since a fragment with the pagination 514 was stuck to this last extant page (see note 84), one may assume the codex continued, perhaps to include as quire 22 pages 505–28. But if in fact the leaf 501–2 were the last extant leaf (it has not been identified), the extant leaves without assigned pagination would fall within the area of pages 441–46, 457–98, and 501–2, a total of at least 25 leaves. Since Rolf Ibscher, to illustrate how fragile the material was, admitted atomizing a leaf with a sneeze, one may assume there should be a total of at least 24 leaves (48 pages) without assigned pagination. Thus the 32 leaves labeled Kephalaia might include 8 more than one would minimally expect to be extant from the Kephalaia. But if in fact the Warsaw leaf labeled 499–500 should be renumbered in the 500s (see above), then all the leaves labeled Kephalaia could in fact belong to that codex. Otherwise one would need to assume that the excess 8 leaves belong to another codex, such as P^{15998}, the Letters. Plate 29 had originally had a printed label reading P^{15998}, and perhaps Plate 30 as well, though now the number is rubbed off, with 15996 written in by hand in both cases; these may hence be tentatively ascribed to P^{15998}. The two without numbers that had been stacked together with P^{15998} are, however, tentatively included still with P^{15996}. Hence the number of unpublished leaves that have not been assigned pagination would tentatively stand at 29 equals 58 pages (those numbered plates 1–28, minus 1 that consists of fragments, equals 27; plus 2 leaves labeled "Kephalaia without number," equals 29 leaves).

Thus 122 unpublished pages with assigned pagination and some 58 pages without assigned pagination in Berlin, plus 6 pages in Vienna and 10 in Warsaw—a total of some 196 unpublished pages of Volume 1 of the Kephalaia—are still extant, although here, as in other cases, the amount of extant text is very much smaller than this figure would suggest.

Wolf-Peter Funk resumed transcription for a time (using P and a raised numeral to identify fragmentary pages), but it extended only from P^{293} to P^{295}, line 11 (concluding with the title of chapter 123).

Hugo Ibscher had not completed the conservation of some leaves, and for this reason they lay unglassed in folders in his home during the war. But his conservation had apparently left no book block of unconserved leaves of the Kephalaia.

On July 16, 1986, 8 additional plates of only temporarily sealed plates of fragments were located in the Storage of the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin, with a note on a piece of paper reading: "Defined and undefined Mani fragments (framed without color)—8 plates." They contain largely unidentified fragments, presumably from the Kephalaia, including a few labels: "P[479] to Kephalaia," "459/60," "Kephalaia top right 503/4??," "Kephalaia 423–424." Plate 1 does contain a fragment with the pagination 479, but fragments with the other paginations were not found. The leaf 423/424 is extant in its proper box, though the pagination is not present.

Reinhold Merkelbach has remarked that chapter 138 is lost except for Polotsky's published German translation: "The Coptic text is lost, there still exists only the German translation."[88]

However, an examination of the papyri in the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin on December 13, 1988, tended to indicate that the papyri containing this chapter are in fact not lost.[89] Merkelbach has confirmed that he had no specific reason for postulating that the leaf or leaves containing this chapter were lost. (Polotsky's transcription has subsequently been located in Berlin; see note 90.)

Transcriptions of 51 unpublished pages of the Berlin Kephalaia preserved in the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin (42 by Polotsky and 9 probably by Böhlig)[90] may contain more text than

89. Chapter 136 begins on page 337, chapter 137 on p. 338, chapter 138 on page 340, chapter 140 and 141 both on page 343. The leaf labeled 341/342 is also extant, on which the continuation and conclusion of chapter 138 (and the beginning of chapter 139) presumably take place. Yet the identity of the leaf in question seemed at first uncertain. For the labels reading 339/340, and with the chapter numeration 138, were affixed in such a way that when the labels were at the top of the page, the writing was upside down, so that the leaf needed to be returned to its upright position. Nor did the fiber directions conform to the pattern of like fiber directions on facing pages. But if the side labeled 339 is relabeled 340, and that labeled 340 relabeled 339, the fiber pattern becomes normal. Furthermore, only on the basis of these corrections do the profiles of this leaf and that of the preceding and following leaves conform to one another. Thus once I made these corrections, the codex seems at this part to be intact, though the text is less legible that it was half a century ago, to judge by the extant German translation.

the surviving unpublished papyrus itself, in view of the deterioration that the papyrus may have undergone during the intervening half century. Five of these same pages of transcriptions from the Kephalaia by Polotsky are also in the Archives in Dublin (pp. 343, 344, 353, 354, 366). There are also 2 pages of transcriptions from the Kephalaia by Polotsky in the Archives in Oxford; although they have not yet been definitely identified (they are right-hand and hence odd-numbered pages), the conventional numeration that Polotsky assigned would suggest that Crum Mss 11.30.23 is page 341 and Crum Mss 11.30.24 (= 11.30.27) is page 347, thus indicating they are also duplicates of those of the Academy in Berlin.

The transcriptions of half a century ago should be made promptly available to the public in some way, with due recognition to the scholar who actually did the work, and especially to Polotsky, in view of the fact that none of Polotsky's work on the Kephalaia published during the Nazi period could appear with his name on the title page.[91]

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15997}, the Acts

According to Schmidt's report, the Fayyumic dealer had explained that the provincial dealer had sold his two parts to Nahman, who had sold them to Schmidt. By the process of elimination, it can be determined that P^{15997} is one of these two: Nahman told Schmidt he acquired for Schmidt the two codices held by the provincial dealer after Nahman had "rejected" Beatty. This so-called rejection cannot be dated to a

Studies in Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium, September 5–10, 1988, lists the following pages: 293, 301–7 (= chs. 125–29), 334, 337–57, 359–73 (= chs. 135–50), 395–99 (= chs. 157–60), 413. Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, reports that from samples that Schenke provided him of the script, he could ascribe pages 334, 337–57, 359–73, and 395–99 to Polotsky; and pages 293 (broken off), 301–7 (307 broken off), and 413 probably to himself. The Jahrbuch der Preussichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Jahrgang 1941 (Berlin: Akademie, 1942), 63, reported concerning Böhlig's work: "The fascicle 11/12 has been worked out apart from a few details (pages 244 to 292). Over and above that, transcriptions of the pages 300ff. could be carried out."

91. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 183 n. 1, stated: "The names of the real editors are missing from the title page for the following reason: The name of H. J. Polotsky was not supposed to appear on the title page in the Nazi time because of the racial legislation. But I turned down the naming of my name alone." It was in fact reported in Kephalaia, 1. Hälfte (1940), iv, at the conclusion of the preface: "The first two double fascicles Dr. H. J. Polotsky prepared. From p. 103 on Dr. A. Böhlig has taken his place."

time prior to Schmidt's seeing the Kephalaia on his first trip, for on his return from Jerusalem Nahman admitted having sold in the intervening time to Beatty. Thus it can hardly be the Kephalaia that belonged to the provincial dealer. Schmidt acquired the 31 leaves of the Synaxeis from the Fayyumic dealer. And he acquired the bulk of the Homilies codex from Nahman via Beatty (see below), when Beatty released the option that he had held on it since March 23, 1930. Thus the two codices in the hands of the provincial dealer must by the process of elimination have been the Acts and the Letters (see below). In fact the Acts must be the codex that Schmidt reported acquiring in the spring of 1931, when he said he had acquired a codex still in its original wooden covers.[92] For in describing P^{15997}, he reported that it was acquired in its covers, and a photograph of this codex in its covers was published. The covers cannot be found at the Egyptian Museum of (East) Berlin, according to Günter Poethke, Custos of Greek Manuscripts in the Papyrus Collection.

Apparently only a few leaves were conserved, just enough to identify the codex. Alexander Böhlig saw one in 1953, which hence must not have been taken to Leningrad (whence material was returned only in 1958), but must have stayed in Berlin in 1946, presumably in the Ibscher home, though the leaf had been conserved well before the war. When Böhlig could not relocate it in Berlin in 1960, he was told by Rolf Ibscher that Ibscher by mistake had taken it to London.[93] It was moved from London to Dublin, but was among those leaves put on deposit in Copenhagen. Facsimiles were published in 1987 in volume 2 of the Facsimile Edition, though the identification is there left open. When one compares Schmidt and Polotsky's summary with the segments that Giversen translated,[94] there can be little doubt that

94. Giversen, "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269: "This must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt or physically be the same. I shall not say much more about this here, since I have dealt with it in the edition Vol. II pp. VIII–IX and I hope to return to it in connection with a preliminary critical edition and translation of the text." The plates are published in Giversen, Homilies and Varia, viii–ix, plates 99–100. On page viii Giversen states:

> The two pages have a text with some historical information, and this can be identified with similar information reported by C. Schmidt from a leaf in Berlin . . . Exactly the same persons are mentioned: Thadamor, Amarô, Sapores the hyparch, Narsaph, Hormezd, Innaios, Abiesus and others. This it is in fact the same text, and, since there is no second copy of the Acts among the codices from Medinet Madi,[95] it is no doubt the same copy.

must either be a parallel text to that mentioned by C. Schmidt, or the leaf must physically be the same. Parallel texts are well known from other papyri, e.g., in the Nag Hammadi texts the two very close long versions of the Apocryphon of John, and the two versions of the Gospel of Truth.

The reference is to Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 28–29:

> Another piece leads us into a later time of Manichaeism. Here a mass of unknown persons come forward . . . Obviously it is here a matter of events that take place within the Persian Kingdom . . . It has to do further with the position assumed by provincial governments toward the Manichaean religion, some of which are disposed positively, especially Amara, who is designated as the "great patron" of the Manichaeans, since they enjoyed his support. Hence one of the heads of the Manichaeans turns to him with the request that he intervene for the persecuted believers in Persia with the king Narsaph, i.e., Narses (293–302). Amaro Innaios takes on this task and sends letters to the higher king that are crowned with success in that the persecutions cease. In these negotiations there occurs a certain, who is apparently the transmittor of the communication of Amaro Innaios to the king. He has an audience with King Narses, the result of which is that the suppressions and persecutions of the teachers and believers are suspended on the order of the king.

Giversen, "Unedited Chester Beatty Mani Texts," 379–80, republished in "Manichaean Texts from the Chester Beatty Collection," 269, has translated segments of this text:

> He told us that the king had arrived into the neighbourhood of our shepherd Innaios, together with the noble Persians who were his assistants. He spoke to him . . . He asked him to go to the king. He achieved mercy for us from him and stopped the (1986: our] destruction. The king together with the noblemen, who were many . . . Innaios, shall I raise Innaios went into . . . of the king [Sapores].

At the 1989 conference in Bonn, Giversen reported that after a visit to the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin he had decided that the relevant leaf is not there and that the leaf in Copenhagen is from this codex.

95. There is a Kephalaia codex in Dublin and one in Berlin, but they are not two copies of the same text, but rather a two-volume set. The Homilies material in Dublin and that (originally) in Berlin apparently belong to the same codex, rather than being two copies of the same text. With regard to Giversen's reference to duplicates in the Nag Hammadi library, all the duplicate texts within that collection of 13 codices prove on closer examination to belong to separate subgroups, only secondarily merged into a collection of collections. Of course in larger manuscript discoveries there are duplicates, e.g., among the Dishna Papers (as the discovery is referred to in Upper Egypt that the academic community has usually referred to as the Bodmer Papyri, since these form the largest block), the Gospel of John: in Greek, P^{66} = P. Bodmer II, and P^{75} = P. Bodmer XIV–XV; and in Coptic, P. Bodmer III, Chester Beatty ac. 1390, and perhaps P. Palau Ribes 182. Yet the Dishna Papers

There are 7 (or 8) leaves of this codex in the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin.[96] Thus there are extant 9 (or 10) unpublished leaves, 18 (or 20) unpublished pages.

Transcriptions of 3 pages that Schmidt and Polotsky used in their essay are preserved by the Archives of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin.[97] also comprise a collection of collections or of individual codices and scrolls from a variety of provenances, whereas the Manichaean codices seem to be a set emanating from a single scriptorium.

Part of one leaf has perhaps turned up at the Institute for Papyrology of Warsaw University.[98]

96. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection in (East) Berlin has penciled notes: "partially glassed," "8 leaves," and, initialed by Rolf Ibscher, "8 leaves are back." It is this reference in the Inventory Book that is no doubt responsible for the comment, "8 leaves in Berlin," in Müller's preliminary listing, "Die koptischen Handschriften," 65–85. This number was then repeated in Beltz's catalogue. But one of the 8 leaves there now has a printed label that reads P^{15998}; where the 8 has been marked out and a 7 written in by hand, a hand identified by Poethke as that of Luke. The leaf also has a separate label in ink reading 36, with the 6 marked out and replaced in pencil with 2. But the labels for the individual leaves of P^{15997} use Roman numerals, with the highest IX, whereas P^{15996} and P^{15998} use Arabic numerals for individual leaves (and where some renumbering also occurs, see there). When one notes that the size of the glass panes in which the leaf in question is conserved is not the large format, used for P^{15998}, but a smaller format used for the 7 leaves of P^{15997}, one can wonder if one smaller leaf of P^{15998} was packed for transport by size along with P^{15997}. When the material was returned from Leningrad, it may have been merely assumed that the eighth small leaf was part of the same codex with which it was packed, and the label "corrected" accordingly. Yet though the extant papyrus is indeed smaller in its dimensions than is usual for P^{15998}, the profile and the frayed edges are not what is characteristic of P^{15997}, though Stephen Patterson has noted a similarity in the scribal hands. The numeration attached to the leaves in Berlin does reach IX, which might suggest that nine leaves had been identified as belonging to P^{15997}. It could have been that the apparent contradiction of these 9 plates with the record in the Inventory Book of 8 having been conserved is what led Rolf Ibscher to "return" one to London. But there is also a leaf (actually only a narrow strip) in Warsaw (see note 98). The identity of the eighth leaf in Berlin thus remains uncertain.

97. Schenke, "Gnosis-Forschung 1984–1988" (see note 90 above).

98. Beltz, "Katalog der koptischen Handschriften," 97–98, states to I 605 = P^{15997}: "In Warsaw there is at present a leaf from this codex at the University." Inventories of July 12, 1986 by Wincenty Myszor and of August 11, 1986 by Wolf-Peter Funk indicate that there is a plate numbered 499/500 that is labeled P^{15997}, though it seems to belong (with 4 other leaves) to P^{15996} (though Beltz does not list it at P^{15996}). But a sixth leaf, between much smaller panes of glass and taped with a different colored tape, has a label whose last digit is illegible (P^{1599}). Myszor read the last digit as 7 but added, it "is not quite clear—it can also be 6!" Funk could not read the digit, since part of Stephen J. Patterson has made draft transcriptions of the seven leaves in Berlin and has as well transcribed the facsimiles of the one leaf in Copenhagen.

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the (East) Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958, the book block was not present. What actually happened to it is not known. The missing wooden covers may have shared the same fate as the book block, from which they may never have been separated, since the conserved leaves may not have been the first and/or last leaves of the codex, but may have been exposed by the dealers breaking the codex open in the middle.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P^{15998}, the Letters

The second of the two codices that the provincial dealer acquired, and passed on to Nahman to sell to Schmidt, can be determined by the same process of elimination to be P^{15998}.

As in the case of the Acts, only a sampling of leavings was conserved, to provide an initial identification. Six leaves are recorded in the Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin as having been taken to Leningrad and returned in 1958. They have been identified in a recent inventory of the material currently in the Papyrus Collection of Berlin as a separate stack with plates of a distinctive format numbered B 12, 13, 21, 23, 24, and 25. (Though 13 had lost its label, it could be identified by means of letters transcribed in Beltz's inventory; see note 3.) But 3 leaves, presumably also conserved by Hugo Ibscher, turned up after World War II in the National Museum in Warsaw.

Alexander Böhlig conjectured that 13 leaves of this codex were by mistake taken to London.[99] This conjecture is based in part on a comment by Rolf Ibscher that the 13 leaves in London were of "an unusually large format," a description that Böhlig thought singled out the paper was broken off, but noted on the other side of the leaf a label of recent date reading "to P^{15997}." This "narrow strip of papyrus" that is scarcely legible (Funk) may hence come from P^{15997}, though this is far from certain. Whether it would be part of one of the leaves taken to Leningrad or counted as a separate leaf is unclear, and hence it is unclear whether it would have been a separate one of the nine leaves that the numeration system suggests, an ambivalence that would tend to obscure even further the identity of the uncertain leaf in Berlin.

99. Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 186–87.

the Letters codex. Yet all the codices may have about the same dimensions, except for the smaller Psalms codex.[100] Böhlig's view is in part based on the absence from the leaves in Berlin of the running heads of 4 pages that Schmidt and Polotsky read, which suggested to Böhlig that these running heads might be on the leaves then in London. But, according to Wolf-Peter Funk's transcriptions, they have been located on the leaves in Warsaw. Böhlig concluded his argument with the comment that "a glance at the London leaves should suffice to solve all these problematic questions with one blow." It was not at the time possible for him to examine them in London. But the Facsimile Edition alone suffices:[101] The leaves are not unusually large and do not contain the running heads that Schmidt and Polotsky quoted. Hence these 13 Dublin leaves that Hugo Ibscher labeled as Codex B seem to belong to Chester Beatty Library Codex B, the Synaxeis codex, not to the Letters, though the 6 leaves of this codex conserved by Hugo Ibscher were also labeled B.

Rolf Ibscher kept half-conserved materials in the family home throughout the war (see above) and then returned them to the Papyrus Collection of (East) Berlin, where they are currently held. Among the 15 plates stacked together with Poethke's note to the effect that they belong to the Letters, 2 are labeled as "Kephalaia without number," 9 are numbered (8–12, 14–16, and 18), and 4 are unnumbered. One unnumbered plate, labeled by Rolf Ibscher "twin separated from number 8," does have the same profile as number 8. A second, labeled "twins" (in Rolf Ibscher's best English) does contain two leaves and has the same profile as number 9, on which a fragment of a second leaf is still stuck; the fragment seems to fit the location of a missing segment of the material labeled "twins." A third also contains two leaves. A fourth lacks the middle segment and was reglassed by Luke in 1970. Thus the 13 plates contain actually 15 leaves, in view of the two instances of "twins."

One plate that originally had the printed label P[15998] and was numbered 29 has the 8 marked out and replaced by 6; and the plate numbered 30 (which actually contains two leaves) has the printed label scraped off and replaced by 15996, thus shifting both to the Kephalaia, and in both cases perhaps from the Letters. Two others listed "Kephalaia without number" were stacked with the 13 leaves, making up the stack of 15 that Poethke ascribed to the Letters, which seems to suggest that these two leaves were thought to belong to the Letters. In fact as many as 8 leaves labeled as belonging to the Kephalaia could belong to another codex, such as the Letters (see above). One leaf with a printed label P[15998] has the 8 marked out and replaced by 7, thus suggesting it earlier was assigned not to the Acts but to the Letters (see above).

100. Hugo Ibscher, in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xiii. The extant leaves of P[15997], the Acts codex, are also in a smaller format, but the book block, to which Ibscher may have had access but we do not, apparently had the larger format.

101. Giversen, Homilies and Varia, ix–x, plates 101–26.

One may hence speak rather tentatively of 28 leaves or 56 pages of the Letters codex being extant today: the 6 leaves = 12 pages returned to Berlin that Hugo Ibscher conserved; the 3 leaves = 6 pages that emerged in Warsaw after the war; 15 leaves = 30 pages from among those that lay half conserved in the Ibscher home during the war and were put in 13 glass containers labelled by Rolf Ibscher; 3 leaves = 6 pages in 2 glass containers as belonging to the Kephalaia; and 1 leaf = 2 pages currently labeled as belonging to the Acts may actually come from the Letters codex. None of it has been published. The amount of text that survives is very much less than these figures suggest.

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958 the book block was not present. What actually happened to it is not known.

Papyrus Collection, Berlin, P[15999], the Bulk of the Homilies

On March 23, 1930, Beatty received from Nahman with an option to buy for £700 the bulk of the Homilies codex, which Hugo Ibscher advised him could not be conserved.

At the beginning of 1932, Beatty learned that Schmidt had a second option to buy the manuscript if Beatty decided not to exercise his option.[102] On March 29, 1932, Beatty finally wrote Nahman that he would not make the purchase, and on May 10, 1932, the manuscript was turned over to Ibscher in London to take back with him to Berlin for Schmidt.[103] The publisher W. Kohlhammer purchased it for the Papyrus Collection of Berlin for a price reported to have been 5,000 marks,[104] and it was inventoried as P[15999]. Though it was suspected to be the bulk of the Homilies codex, the rest of which Ibscher had in fact successfully conserved (Chester Beatty Library Codex D),[105] it was never considered to be conservable. Rather it was kept as a sort of showpiece of how impossible the conservation of these codices was.[106]

a note concerning this manuscript: "Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman." Technically speaking, the manuscript was released back to Nahman to dispose of as he saw fit. Yet Ibscher was not going to Cairo, but rather to Berlin. On May 14, 1932, before leaving London for Berlin, Ibscher wrote a receipt for Beatty, "to confirm that I have correctly received the Mani manuscript for Prof. Schmidt."

104. In a letter of August 29, 1957, from Rolf Ibscher to Carsten Colpe. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection reports: "Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer." The reference to the acquisition in Cairo is literal only in the sense that Schmidt was in Egypt when Beatty released his option, and Schmidt exercised his option with Nahman in Cairo. But the manuscript itself had long since permanently left Egypt.

105. Hugo Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," in Polotsky, Manichäische Homilien, xii: "Whether the text published here is part of a lost Mani book, or belongs to one of the extant volumes not yet undertaken by me, can for the time being not be determined." This undecidedness corresponds to the statement of Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30, concerning the Berlin part: "The papyrus book that has most recently been added to the corpus of the Berlin Manichaica could not yet be subjected to any further investigation. But this much seems to be certain, that it contains a collection of so-called λογοι (both the Coptic and the English use the same Greek loan word) of various authors. On the upper margins authors' names from the circle of Mani's disciples occur, such as Koustaios, Salmaios." But in the same essay, page 34, concerning the London part, the identification is affirmed: "A second papyrus book contains a collection of homilies (λογοι) of various contents and by various authors . . . Of this book, as I mentioned above [!], a voluminous part has come to Berlin." Alexander Böhlig, in a letter of February 3, 1989, has pointed out that in view of the frequent occurrence of homilies in Manichaean literature, one cannot be certain that this is part of the same codex of homilies as that of Beatty's that contains homilies. But then one would have to assume that the minor part of a codex of homilies that Beatty acquired in 1931 was part of an otherwise lost codex, whereas the homilies codex that Beatty obtained on approval from Nahman in 1930 would be a separate codex. It would seem simpler to assume that here, as in the case of the Psalms codex sold to Beatty in two installments, at the same time as were sold the two texts with homilies, and hence probably in the same two transactions, one has to do with two parts of the same codex. By marketing the two parts of a single codex in separate transactions, the dealer might assume a client would not notice that one had to do with two parts of the same codex—all the more so given the condition of the papyrus and Beatty's status as an amateur, not a scholar. Nahman probably had two codices that he succeeded in selling as four.

106. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin listed its location not, as in the case of the others, as a shelf in the work area, but as "displayed," i.e. on

The unconserved book block is assumed to have been among the Berlin Museum holdings that were taken to Leningrad in 1946, but when those holdings were returned in 1958 the book block was not present.[107] What actually happened to it is not known.

Few manuscript discoveries of the importance of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi have undergone such an ambivalent fate after their discovery. Since the leaves had been stuck together by salt crystals due to the dampness in which they were conjectured to have lain for a millennium and a half, their condition was such that the first scholar to see them, Lange, did not acquire them. Schmidt passed them up the first time he saw them; neither did Adolf von Harnack favor their acquisition; Schmidt's decision to acquire them was in part based upon his hearing that the famous bibliophile, Beatty, had acquired some. But Beatty at first acquired only with an option to buy, which he exercised only in part, and then only on receiving encouragement from Schmidt via Ibscher. Thus the material barely escaped being bypassed by the academic community.

The conservation and editing began under what might seem to be a lucky star, with two competing geniuses—Ibscher and Polotsky—working in collaboration,[108] so that each newly exposed leaf on the book block could be transcribed before being removed, thus producing a better transcription for at least the exposed side than might be possible after it had been removed and perhaps damaged in the process, and providing an aide memoire for reassembling the leaf after it was exhibit. Rolf Ibscher, "Der Mani-Fund," 228: "Codex 15999, because of its unimpressive appearance, immediately wandered into the permanent display of the Berlin Museums, as a visible example of the terrible degeneration of the whole manuscript find." See Böhlig, "Die Arbeit," 157–61; and Actes du XXVe Congrès International des Orientalistes, Moscou 9–16 août 1960, 535–41; but here it is cited according to Böhlig's collected essays, Mysterion und Wahrheit, 177–87, especially 184: "The condition of the manuscript was so desolate that among the collaborators of the Papyrus Collection it was generally designated as the 'wig.'"

107. The Inventory Book of the Papyrus Collection of Berlin includes a note added in purple carbon reading, "at present in Moscow." Presumably this should read: Leningrad. This is the only indication in the Inventory Book as to the fate of any of the book blocks.

108. Böhlig, in a letter of February 5, 1989, recalls that the actual relationship was more nearly that of hostility. Polotsky was dependent on the speed, regularity, and success of Ibscher's conservation; Ibscher was dependent on Polotsky for the correct placement of fragments removed from the book block one by one, and may have been delayed by Polotsky's wishing to transcribe a surface before the leaf was removed from the book block.

peeled off the book block. Alexander Böhlig, who became Polotsky's assistant in 1933 and successor in 1934, himself was never so involved, though he might well have been, had the procedure in fact been functioning well. Efforts by the son, Rolf Ibscher, to reestablish such teamwork after the war, though several alternatives were envisaged, did not actually materialize in a way to produce comparably successful results, though Böhlig would have liked to have become more involved with Ibscher's work than an occasional visit to Göttingen made possible. After the material was returned from Leningrad to Berlin in 1958, he proposed in 1959 to the German Academy of Sciences in Berlin that it resume publication. In 1960 the Academy's Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde (rather than the Academy's Orientalische Kommission, which, prior to the war, had been in charge), through the subdivision Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte, commissioned Böhlig to prepare the publications. On July 5, 1960, Böhlig wrote T. C. Skeat of the British Museum for permission to see the conserved leaves there, expressing particular interest in the 13 unidentified leaves and leaves reported to have been found lying inside Beatty's Kephalaia codex. Böhlig proposed bringing Ibscher with him to remove opaque cellophane paper that lay between the papyrus and the glass, which would, if left in place, effectively prevent reading the text. On July 13, 1960, R. J. Hayes, honorary librarian of the Chester Beatty Library, replied that Böhlig could see the leaves, but that one could not remove the cellophane—a restriction apparently intended to insure that Rolf Ibscher, whose work had been terminated with some hard feelings, not return again.[109]

At the Twenty-Fifth Congress of Orientalists in Moscow in August of 1960, Böhlig presented the status of the Manichaean codices. A resolution was passed advocating international cooperation in publishing the codices.[110] On August 15, 1960, Johannes Irmscher, then director of the Institut für griechisch-römische Altertumskunde of the Deutsche Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin, wrote to Hayes informing him of this resolution and soliciting his cooperation, commending both Böhlig and Ibscher. Hayes responded on December

109. T. C. Skeat forwarded Böhlig's letter to Hayes on July 11, 1960, with the comment: "I must leave you to deal with the suggestion that he should bring Ibscher with him!"

5, 1960, that the restoration was being done at the British Museum, and that the Coptic experts there would converse with Böhlig on the occasion of a visit anticipated for 1961. Böhlig in fact did not go, since without Ibscher he could not remove the cellophane to make the leaves legible, and because of the impossibilities of his making such a trip at the time. The Berlin Wall was erected August 13, 1961. Böhlig hoped that Peter Nagel would take over his work in Berlin after he himself moved in 1963 to West Germany. Böhlig hoped that, for his part, he would be able to activate the English. But none of this materialized, and Coptological scholarship moved increasingly into Nag Hammadi studies.

The book blocks with the unconserved bulk of three codices (the Acts, the Letters, and the Homilies) have been lost. Of the four largely extant codices, half of one (the Synaxeis) has not been conserved but is extant as a currently unconservable book block. Of the leaves that have been conserved from all seven codices, about half have been published in critical editions; the unpublished half, most of which was conserved by Rolf Ibscher, is largely illegible, as the Facsimile Edition makes apparent.

This discovery was caught up to a very abnormal degree in the political disasters of the time: the departure of Polotsky for Jerusalem in 1933 to avoid the baneful auspices of the Third Reich; the death of C. R. C. Allberry through the shooting down of his plane over the Netherlands just before midnight on April 3, 1943;[111] the inaccessibility of the material in the Zoo bunker during the war and then in Leningrad for twelve years (1946–1958)—it actually became accessible again only in 1960, a hiatus of two decades. By this time Carl Schmidt and Hugo Ibscher had died, and the next generation simply did not succeed in carrying forward the work as it had been initiated so promisingly by the first generation, though Alexander Böhlig and Rolf Ibscher worked vigorously, though largely in isolation.[112] Alexander

111. Allberry's tragic life led a classmate C. P. Snow to write a novel, Light and the Dark, whose hero, Roy Calvert, is based largely on Allberry but also on the character Larry Darrell in Somerset Maugham's The Razor's Edge. When the novel was included in a series of television renderings of Snow's sequence of novels, Strangers and Brothers, Allberry's widow, Mrs. Patricia K. G. Lewis, felt called upon to clear Allberry's name by publishing privately a collection of testimonials and recollections: Lewis, Charles Allberry: A Portrait. Böhlig is the only member of the earlier team who has continued to be active and thus to provide some continuity in the current revival of interest in the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi.

The plans worked out in 1931 for a complete coordination in the conservation, editing, and publication of the material, in spite of the plurality of ownership, began to be implemented successfully, as is evident from the publications between 1934 and 1966 by Polotsky, Böhlig, and Allberry from three codices in two parallel series at Kohlhammer in Stuttgart. Now, a generation or more later, the academic community has become aware that a salvage operation is urgently needed if the editing and publishing of this important manuscript discovery, which began so auspiciously, is not to end quite dismally.

The International Association for Coptic Studies expressed its approval of both the projects that have recently been proposed and hoped that there will be collaboration between them. This is a hope that we all, as participants in the Second International Conference on Manichaeism should heartily share, and that the newly founded International Association of Manichaean Studies might seek to implement.

The Acquisitions of Carl Schmidt

The basic publication reporting on the circumstances of the acquisition of the Manichaean codices of Medinet Madi (Τερενοῦθις) is the report to the Berlin Academy of Sciences by Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky, with a contribution by Hugo Ibscher, submitted July 28, 1932, and published the following year:[1]

On the occasion of a research trip to Palestine [early in 1930] . . . while passing through Cairo, I [Carl Schmidt] paid a visit to the various antiquities dealers I knew. Among other things, a papyrus book [P[15996], Kephalaia] was put before me that was in an extremely desolate condition, so that I hardly dared to touch it. Fortunately I could decipher in the upper margin the word ⲛ̄ⲕⲉϕⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ and in the text read the beginning of a section: "Again the Illuminator (ϕⲱⲥⲧⲏⲣ) spoke" . . . and the content must go back to an author who ascribed to himself the honorary title of an "Illuminator" or was honored as such by his followers, and who

Bei Gelegenheit einer Forschungsreise nach Palästina . . . [early in 1930] stattete ich [Carl Schmidt] auf der Durchreise in Kairo den verschiedenen mir bekannten Antikenhändlern einen Besuch ab. Unter anderem wurde mir ein Papyrusbuch [P[15996], Kephalaia]vorgelegt, das sich in einem höchst desolaten Zustande befand, daher ich es kaum zu berühren wagte. Zum Glück konnte ich auf dem oberen Rande das Wort ⲛ̄ⲕⲉϕⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ entziffern und im Texte den Anfang eines Abschnittes lesen: "Wiederum sprach der Erleuchter (ϕⲱⲥⲧⲏⲣ)" . . . , und der Inhalt musste auf einen Verfassser zurückgehen, der sich selbst had collected a circle of disciples around himself . . . In happy excitement about this discovery I communicated information about it to his Excellency [Adolf] von Harnack and others whom I knew in Berlin, but I struck upon great skepticism, since no one wanted to believe in the discovery of original works of Mani. I was referred to anti-Manichaean writings from Egypt such as Alexander of Lycopolis or Serapion of Thmuis. So I drew back from an acquisition. Only on my return from Jerusalem was my attention led again to the papyrus, as I learned from the antiquities dealer that Mr. Chester Beatty, a well-known collector of manuscripts, had acquired [March 23, 1930] papyrus books similar to the one offered to me. This gave me the courage to acquire the papyrus at my own risk, especially since no downpayment was required of me. But I had not taken into account the fact that in the meantime a severe financial crisis had occurred in Germany, which also involved the museums and libraries too heavily for larger amounts to be provided for acquisitions. Hence all the efforts that were so kindly supported by my colleague Prof. Erich Seeberg seemed to be without success. Thus the danger was near that this valuable treasure might be lost to German scholarship. Then at the last minute a lucky star arose in the person of an unnamed Maecenas [August Pfeffer], who had been made aware of the significance of the den Ehrentitel eines "Erleuchters" beigelegt hatte oder als solcher von den Anhängern verehrt wurde, und der einen Jüngerkreis um sich versammelt hatte . . . In freudiger Erregung über diese Entdeckung machte ich Exzellenz [Adolf] von Harnack und anderen Bekannten in Berlin davon Mitteilung, stiess aber auf grosse Skepsis, da niemand an die Auffindung von Originalwerken des Mani glauben wollte. Ich wurde auf manichäische Gegenschriften aus Ägypten wie Alexander von Lycopolis oder Serapion von Thmuis hingewiesen. So trat ich von einer Erwerbung zurück. Erst bei meiner Rückkehr von Jerusalem wurde meine Aufmerksamkeit auf den Papyrus wieder gelenkt, als ich von dem Antikenhändler erfuhr, dass Mr. Chester Beatty, ein bekannter Sammler von Handschriften, ähnliche Papyrusbücher wie das mir angebotene erworben hätte [23 March 1930]. Dies gab mir den Mut, den Papyrus auf mein eigenes Risiko zu erwerben, zumal keine Anzahlung von mir verlangt wurde. Aber ich hatte nicht damit gerechnet, dass in Deutschland inzwischen eine schwere Finanzkrise ausgebrochen war, die auch die Museen und Bibliotheken zu stark in Mitleidenschaft zog, um grössere Summen für Ankäufe bereitstellen zu können. Daher schienen alle Bemühungen, die von meinem Kollegen Prof. Erich Seeberg in dankenswerter Weise unterstützt wurden, erfolglos zu sein und damit die Gefahr in die Nähe gerückt, dass dieser kostbare Schatz der deutschen Wissenschaft verlorenginge. Da tauchte im letzten Moment ein Rettungsstern in der Person eines ungenannten Mäzens [August Pfeffer] auf, der durch find by my friend Dr. E. Lubowski. In great-hearted liberality he provided the Egyptian Museum with the purchase price, indeed he even expressed his willingness, in case further pieces of the papyrus book should come on the market in the Egyptian antiquities trade, to provide further means for their acquisition. German scholarship hence owes warm appreciation to this Maecenas, especially since such understanding patrons can be counted as rarities in the hard times of today.

So in the spring of 1931 I could again begin a trip to Egypt . . . My trip had as its main purpose to investigate further the find as such, i.e. to collect more precise information about the site of the discovery, but especially to determine whether still further papyrus books from the same find had cropped up on the antiquities market. For anyone who is familiar with the antiquities trade knows very well that in the case of larger papyrus discoveries all the material is never brought to market at once, either by the discoverers or by the dealers, so as not to depress the price in offering larger quantities. My intuition had not deceived me, for already on my first visit to an antiquities dealer in Cairo he put before me two piles of papyrus [P[15996] Kephalaia] that outwardly recalled only too well those that had been earlier acquired. And again I could decipher on the upper margin the word ⲛ̄ⲕⲉⲫⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ. Thus it was proven that it belonged to meinen Freund Dr. E. Lubowski auf die Bedeutung des Fundes aufmerksam gemacht war. In hochherziger Liberalität hat er den Kaufpreis für das Ägyptische Museum erstattet, ja, er erklärte sich bereit, sollten weitere Stücke des Papyrusbuches im ägyptischen Antikenhandel auf den Markt kommen, weitere Mittel zu deren Erwerbung zur Verfügung stellen zu wollen. Die deutsche Wissenschaft ist daher diesem Mäzen zu heissestem Dank verpflichtet, zumal in der heutigen Notzeit so verständnisvolle Mäzene zu den Seltenheiten zu rechnen sind.

So konnte ich im Frühjahr 1931 wiederum eine Reise nach Ägypten antreten . . . Meine Reise hatte den Hauptzweck, dem Funde als solchem weiter nachzugehen, d.h. über den Fundort nähere Erkundigungen einzuziehen, insbesondere aber festzustellen, ob noch weitere Papyrusbücher aus demselben Funde auf dem Antikenmarkte auftauchen würden. Denn wer mit dem Antikenhandel vertraut ist, weiss zur Genüge, dass bei grösseren Papyrusfunden niemals das ganze Material, sei es von den Findern, sei es von den Händlern, auf einmal auf den Markt gebracht wird, um den Preis bei Angebot grösseren Umfangs nicht herabzudrücken. Meine Ahnung hatte mich nicht betrogen, denn gleich beim ersten Besuche eines Antikenhändlers in Kairo legte er mir zwei Papyrushaufen [P[15996], Kephalaia] vor, die dem Äussern nach nur zu sehr an jene früher erworbenen erinnerten. Und wieder konnte ich auf dem oberen Rande das Wort ⲛ̄ⲕⲉⲫⲁⲗⲁⲓⲟⲛ entziffern. Damit war die Zugehörigkeit zu dem Originalwerke erwiesen. Daneben kam ein Papyrusbuch [P[15997], the original work. In the process, a papyrus book [P[15997], Acta] emerged that lay in the original condition as when found, between two bare wooden covers, since one had risked no further handling. The whole was in such a condition of decomposition that even the dealer did not think he could recommend the acquisition to me, to spare me a later deception or a protest to him . . .

Unfortunately, I was completely in the dark thus far about the site of the discovery. The dialect used in the text pointed to Upper Egypt, but many indications regarding the dealers spoke for the Fayyum. Hence my next visit, accompanied by Privy Councillor Moritz, was paid to an old business friend there. And again I had not been deceived, for he [p. 8] showed me a few unimpressive piles that on the first glance betrayed the fact that they belonged to the Mani discovery. So here the source was uncovered from which Mr. Chester Beatty had carried out his acquisition. And now there was no further difficulty in obtaining from the mouth of this well-versed dealer further information about the whole discovery. First of all, the news was important that three dealers had divided the discovery among themselves, and in fact there had been eight parts, of which he himself had gotten three parts, the dealer in Cairo also three parts, and a provincial dealer two parts. Of course this first partition was not the end of it, but each had carried out further divi-

Das Ganze befand sich in einem solchen Zerfall, dass selbst der Händler den Ankauf mir nicht empfehlen zu können glaubte, um mir eine spätere Enttäuschung bzw. Reklamation bei ihm zu ersparen . . .

Leider war ich bis dahin über den Fundort ganz im unklaren. Der im Text gebotene Dialekt wies nach Oberägypten, aber manche Anzeichen in Rücksicht auf die Händler sprachen für das Fajum. Daher galt mein nächster Besuch in Begleitung von Hrn. Geheimrat Moritz einem dortigen alten Geschäftsfreunde. Und wieder hatte ich mich nicht getäuscht, denn er [p. 8] zeigte mir einige unansehnliche Haufen, die ihre Zugehörigkeit zu dem Mani-Funde auf den ersten Blick verrieten. Hier war also die Quelle entdeckt, aus der Mr. Chester Beatty seine Erwerbung getätigt hatte. Und nun machte es keine Schwierigkeit mehr, aus dem Munde dieses sehr versierten Händlers über den ganzen Fund nähere Kunde zu erhalten. Zunächst war von Wichtigkeit die Mitteilung, dass drei Händler den Fund unter sich geteilt hätten, und zwar wären es acht Teile gewesen, davon er selbst drei Teile, der Händler in Kairo ebenfalls drei Teile und ein Provinzhändler zwei Teile erhalten hätten. Natürlich war es bei dieser ersten Teilung nicht geblieben, sondern jeder hatte weitere Teilungen vorgenommen, um möglichst viel Geld herauszus-sions in order to squeeze out of it as much money as possible. And what was even worse, one had removed the top and bottom layers of papyrus, which had suffered to an especial extent against the covers of the binding—a phenomenon that we experience in almost all codices—, to give the whole a better appearance. How much was lost in this manipulation one is not able now to judge. So I found such outwardly unimpressive remains, which doubtless belong to the papyrus books acquired by Mr. Chester Beatty in the Fayyum [only the Synaxeis was acquired in Egypt partly by Beatty, partly by Schmidt], and, for the sake of completeness, so as not to let the least bit get lost, acquired them for a cheap sum, since the dealer already had his great reward in his pocket. [Note 1: Prof (Adolf) Grohmann of Prague has acquired such rags for the papyrus section of the Vienna State Library from a dealer in Eshmunen (the remains of Kephalaia, 311–20)]. Ibscher recently saved fragments of two leaves from this junk heap. —On my last trip in the Spring of 1932 I found still two further piles [P[15996], Kephalaia] that had been peeled off, and brought them to Berlin.] I do not regret my decision, for in the conservation 31 leaves could be brought under glass in more or less fragmentary preservation [P[15995], Synaxeis]. Whereas the antiquities dealer in the Fayyum had sold his manuscripts exclusively to Mr. Chester Beatty, the Cairo one had divided his holdchlagen. Und was noch schlimmer war, man hatte die oberen und unteren Papyruslagen, die unter den Einbanddecken in besonderem Masse gelitten hatten—eine Erscheinung, die wir bei fast allen Kodizes erleben—abgehoben, um dem Ganzen ein besseres Aussehen zu geben. Wieviel bei dieser Manipulation zugrunde gegangen ist, entzieht sich jetzt der Beurteilung. So fand ich solche äusserlich unscheinbaren Reste, die ohne Zweifel zu den von Mr. Chester Beatty im Fajum erworbenen Papyrusbüchern gehören [only the Synaxeis was acquired in Egypt partly by Beatty, partly by Schmidt], und habe sie der Vollständigkeit halber, um nicht das geringste verlorengehen zu lassen, für billiges Geld erworben, da der Händler seinen grossen Verdienst bereits in der Tasche hatte. [Note 1: Derartige Fetzen hat Prof. (Adolf) Grohmann, Prag, für die Papyrusabteilung der Wiener Staatsbibliothek von einem Händler aus Eschmunen erworben [the remains of Kephalaia, pp. 311–20]. Ibscher hat jüngst Fragmente von zwei Blättern aus diesem Müllhaufen gerettet.—Bei meiner letzten Reise im Frühjahr 1932 fand ich noch zwei weitere abgehobene Haufen [P[15996], Kephalaia] vor und brachte sie nach Berlin.] Ich bereue meinen Entschluss nicht, denn bei der Konservierung konnten 31 Blätter in mehr oder weniger fragmentarischer Erhaltung unter Glas gebracht werden [P[15995], Synaxeis]. Hatte der Fajumer Antikenhändler ings between Chester Beatty and myself, and, after he had turned him away, bought up the two pieces of the provincial, in order to offer them to me. But what was of the greatest importance: My man of confidence could give me a precise statement about the site of the discovery, which doubtless no one would have been able to guess. For the Mani books are written in the so-called Subachmimic dialect. Hence the translation must have originally been done in the region where this local dialect was at home. That was an Upper Egyptian dialect, which, as we will come to see in more detail, was spoken in the region of Assiut. According to what was told me, the site of the discovery was what is now called Medinet Madi, a place little known even to papyrologists . . . [p. 9]

My man of confidence must have had the whole discovery before his eyes, for, according to a passing comment that he just now made to me on my visit in March 1932, the papyrus books, each surrounded by bare covers in wood, lay in a wooden box that was found in what had been a dwelling house. The wooden box was said to have been rotten, so that saving it would not have been worthwhile. It seems as if the whole discovery had been offered by the Arabic discoverers to the antiquities dealer of the Fayyum, but the dealer had not risked putting his money alone in these unimpressive papyrus books, which is why he divided seine Handschriften ausschliesslich an Mr. Chester Beatty verkauft, so hatte der Kairener seinen Besitz zwischen Chester Beatty und mir geteilt und hatte, nachdem er diesen abgestossen, die beiden Stücke des Provinzlers aufgekauft, um sie mir anzubieten. Aber was von höchster Wichtigkeit war: Mein Gewährsmann konnte mir auch eine genaue Angabe über den Fundort machen, den wohl niemand hätte erraten können. Denn die Mani-Bücher sind im sogenannten sub-achmimischen Dialekt abgefasst; die Übersetzung muss also ursprünglich in dem Gebiet stattgefunden haben, wo dieser Lokaldialekt heimisch war. Das war ein oberägyptischer Dialekt, der, wie wir noch näher erkennen werden, im Gebiete von Assiut gesprochen wurde. Den Mitteilungen zufolge war der Fundort das heutige Medinet Madi, ein selbst den Papyrologen wenig bekannter Ort . . . [p. 9]

Den gesamten Fund muss mein Gewährsmann noch vor Augen gehabt haben, denn nach beiläufiger Mitteilung, die er mir jetzt beim Besuch im März 1932 machte, lagen die Papyrusbücher, jedes von kahlen Deckeln in Holz umgeben, in einer Holzkiste, die in einem früheren Wohnhause aufgefunden wurde. Die Holzkiste soll zerfallen gewesen sein, so dass eine Aufbewahrung sich nicht lohnte. Es hat den Anschein, als ob dem Antikenhändler im Fajum der ganze Fund von den arabischen Findern angeboten wurde, dieser aber sich nicht getraute, sein Geld allein in diesen unansehnlichen Papyrusbüchern anzulegen, weshalb er den Fund mit anderen Händlern teilte. Damit wird auch eine Beobachtung von Dr. Ibscher bestätigt, dass die Mani-Handschriften infolge ihrer feuchten Lagerung in absehbarer the discovery with other dealers. This also confirms an observation by Dr. Ibscher to the effect that the Mani manuscripts were near disintegration in the foreseeable future as a result of their damp storage; that is to say, they could not have been lying in the dry desert earth. For the basements of the houses of Medinet Madi were exposed to dampness from above and below, so that the papyri could be drenched through and through with salt crystals. The whole region is a swamp area, even if the old settlement was placed on the back of a hill . . . [p. 10]

Meanwhile Dr. Ibscher has brought the Mani holdings of Chester Beatty from London to Berlin to put them under glass right here at his leisure. I myself had a conference in London with those interested in the discovery, Sir Herbert Thompson, Dr. W. E. Crum and Prof. Alan H. Gardiner, concerning some kind of collaboration with regard to a literary whole that basically belongs together, and it was agreed that expenses should be shared to interest a young collaborator. I could present such a one in the person of Dr. Polotsky, after my Maecenas [August Pfeffer] in the most generous way had assured his involvement for two years, so that the work could be begun seriously in July 1931.

Zeit dem Zerfall nahegebracht wären, also nicht in der trockenen Wüstenerde gelegen haben können. Denn die Keller der Häuser von Medinet Madi waren der Feuchtigkeit von oben und unten ausgesetzt, so dass die Papyri von Salzkristallen vollständig durchsetzt werden konnten. Die ganze Gegend ist Sumpfgebiet, wenn auch die alte Siedlung auf dem Hügelrücken angelegt war . . . [p. 10]

Inzwischen hatte Dr. Ibscher den Mani-Besitz von Chester Beatty von London nach Berlin gebracht, um ihn hier an Ort und Stelle in aller Ruhe unter Glas zu bringen. Ich selbst hatte in London mit den Interessenten des Fundes, mit Sir Herbert Thompson, Dr. W. E. Crum und Prof. Alan H. Gardiner eine Konferenz betreffs einer gewissen Zusammenarbeit bei einem im Grunde zusammengehörenden Literaturganzen, und es wurde vereinbart, dass auf gemeinsame Kosten ein jüngerer Mitarbeiter angeworben werden sollte. Ich konnte diesen in der Person von Dr. Polotsky präsentieren, nachdem auch mein Mäzen [August Pfeffer] in hochherziger Weise seinen Anteil auf zwei Jahre sichergestellt hatte, so dass die Arbeit im Juli 1931 ernstlich in Angriff genommen werden konnte.

Schmidt published a more popularized summary of this lengthy article in a speech presented to the annual meeting of the Gesellschaft für Kirchengeschichte in Berlin on November 9, 1932. In general there is no new information in it, except for an occasional formulation that happens to be more precise or detailed than the equivalent section of the lengthier report. Thus the statement about the discovery and acquisition:[2]

In the year 1930 fellahin, so-called sebachin, who rummage through the junk heaps in old abandoned towns and settlements in search of salty earth to fertilize the ground as a substitute for expensive potash, discovered in Medinet Madi, in the ruins of a town in the southwest of the Fayyum, a wooden box in the ruins of a house. The wooden box disintegrated when brought out to the light, but its content remained intact. The box contained a series of papyrus books, each surrounded by rough wooden covers. The discoverers immediately offered their treasure to an antiquities dealer in the Fayyum, who acquired the whole, surely for a ridiculously low sum. Unfortunately the dealer divided the papyrus books with two other antiquities dealers, so that they surfaced at different places on the antiquities market . . . [p. 6]

Meanwhile the London private collector had enlarged his possession by new acquisitions, and I too could in the spring of 1932 add a new

Im Jahre 1930 haben nun Fellachen, sog. Sebachin, die in den verlassenen alten Städten und Siedlungen die Schutthügel durchwühlten nach salzhaltigen Erdmassen für die Bedüngung des Bodens als Ersatz für das zu teure Kali, in Medinet Madi, einer Ruinenstadt im Südwesten des Fajum, eine Holzkiste in den Ruinen eines Hauses aufgefunden. Die Holzkiste zerfiel beim Herausheben ans Tageslicht, erhalten blieb ihr Inhalt. Die Kiste enthielt eine Reihe Papyrusbücher, jedes von rohen Holzdeckeln umgeben. Sofort haben die Finder ihren Schatz einem Antikenhändler im Fajum angeboten, und das Ganze ist von ihm sicherlich für ein Spottgeld erworben wooden. Leider hat der Händler die Papyrusbücher noch auf zwei andere Antikenhändler verteilt, so dass sie an verschiedenen Stellen auf dem Antikenmarkt auftauchten . . . [p. 6]

Inzwischen hatte auch der Londoner Privatsammler seinen Besitz durch neue Ankäufe vermehrt, und auch ich konnte noch im Frühjahr 1932 ein neues Stück piece to the Berlin Manichaica [P15995, Synaxeis]. Thus, as far as one can now tell, the whole find is united in the London and Berlin collection; each possesses about a half.

[P15995, Synaxeis] den Berliner Manichaica hinzufügen. So ist denn, so viel man jetzt übersehen kann, der ganze Fund in der Londoner und Berliner Sammlung vereinigt; jede besitzt ungefähr die Hälfte.

Schmidt did not state the purchase price. Later Rolf Ibscher mentioned a price that seems very high:[3]

In acquiring the discovery, sold very expensively by the three dealers for about 80,000 gold marks, it was clear to C. Schmidt that, apart from skill at restoring that yielded to no difficulties, this terribly rotted papyrus discovery could never be made accessible to scholarship. But he took upon himself the risk.

Bei der Erwerbung des von den drei Händlern mit rund 80.000 Goldmark reichlich teuer verkauften Fundes, war es C. Schmidt klar, dass ohne eine keine Schwierigkeiten kennende Restaurierungskunst dieser masslos verrottete Papyrusfund niemals wissenschaftlich erschlossen werden könnte. Aber er nahm das Risiko auf sich.

The bulk of one codex, P15999, was in so bad a condition that it was referred to as the wig, and its conservation was ruled to be impossible. Yet, according to Rolf Ibscher, it was purchased for five thousand marks through a gift by Dr. W. Kohlhammer, the publisher of the Manichaica, who was enthusiastic enough about them to produce a Coptic type font imitating one of the hands of these codices.[4] In the spring of 1932 an exchange rate of 18 Reichsmark = £1 was reported.[5] This would mean that 80,000 marks equaled £4,444, and that 5,000 marks = £347.

C. R. C. Allberry's article of 1938, based primarily on the published report by Schmidt and Polotsky, only added occasional details to what was already in print. He dated Schmidt's initial experience of being shown a codex that he was able to identify as Kephalaia to 1930, which the original report had not made explicit.[6]

Søren Giversen reported in 1988 that the discovery dates to 1929, since a Danish Egyptologist, H. O. Lange, saw some of the material in Cairo on November 29, 1929, a dating that Schmidt verified in 1936.[7]

7. Giversen, Manichaean Papyri, 1, speaks of "their rediscovery in 1929," and explains on page 3: "The first European scholar to see them was the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange who saw them in November 1929, when parts of them were offered for sale in Cairo. At that time they had been split up into blocks; outer pages, which were not very nice, had been removed and the papyri had also been damaged in other ways." Giversen, Manichaean Coptic Papyri, 3:vii–viii, reports in more detail: "The first scholar to see one of the Manichaean Coptic papyri from Medinet Madi was the Danish Egyptologist H. O. Lange, who saw the papyrus on 29 November 1929. This was noted in Lange's diary on a journey to Egypt in 1929–30 (The diary is in The Royal Library in Copenhagen, Ny kgl. Samling 3919, 4o), and is verified by Carl Schmidt in a letter to H. O. Lange dated 20 February 1936 (The Royal Library, Copenhagen, Ny kgl. Samling 3736, 4o)."

The Acquisitions of Chester Beatty

The Archives of the Chester Beatty Library have made unpublished materials available that fill in many details omitted in the published German reports.

Sir Chester Beatty already had in place a procedure for the procurement and processing of Egyptian manuscripts when the Manichaean materials appeared on the market. As early as January 26, 1925, he purchased two Coptic manuscripts from the leading Cairo antiquities dealer of the day, whose ledger sheet on which the receipt was written had as its printed heading: Maurice Nahman Antiquaire, 27, Rue El-Madabegh, 27. Early in 1930, Beatty had Nahman send to Eric G. Millar of the Department of Manuscripts of the British Museum various manuscripts he acquired on approval. Beatty wrote from Cairo to J. W. Corble of his London staff to notify Millar to that effect. Beatty asked Corble to "cable his [Millar's] opinion," using a "code" in cables. The code consisted of "Copper Mine" for a Coptic manuscript, "Silver" for a Greek papyrus, and "Gold Mine" for "rare and valuable." In at least one instance Millar consulted Sir Harold I. Bell, whereupon John Wooderson, Beatty's secretary, cabled to Beatty the contents of a resultant phone conversation between Millar and himself, Wooderson. This content was also communicated orally to Edwards, a mutual friend, who must have been traveling just then from London to Cairo. Millar also wrote to Corble enclosing for Beatty a letter providing written confirmation of the oral telegraphed message. This letter graded as a "Silver Mine" a third-century Septuagint text of Daniel (Chester Beatty Biblical Papyrus X) and as a "Gold Mine" a fourth-century text of Genesis (Chester Beatty Biblical Papyrus IV).

Thus, Beatty, himself no expert in such matters, but a mining entrepreneur, had at his disposal the British Museum and its access to British scholarship.

As recently as January 23, 1930, Hugo Ibscher had sent from Berlin a bill for conservation work recently completed in London; he anticipated returning to London in June 1930 to resume this activity. Thus, Beatty had at his disposal the leading papyrus conservator of the day.

A ledger sheet with Nahman's letterhead dated March 23, 1930, and made out to Beatty, at the time in Cairo, listed prices alongside fifteen items for sale. There are also notes as to which are to be returned and which kept. A last item, offered for £1200, was separated from the rest by an empty space. It was described as follows: "Two Coptic manuscripts a[nd] two binding[s] in wood." Underneath, notes were added that read:

On approval	£700	Mss
	£40	Binding

The figure 40 was written on top of "incl."

On the back of the ledger sheet is then a list of the items to be purchased, with their prices, and a total. The last in the list reads:

Two Bindings	£80

Beside this entry is the note: "Can be returned if B[ritish] M[useum] says they are later than VI century." Apparently the two bindings had originally been included in the price of the two codices, then had been priced apart as £40, then sold at £40 each. There is then a second ledger sheet, where these purchased items are listed, with the concluding handwritten note: "Settled with thanks, M. Nahman." The last in this list of acquired objects reads: "Two binding[s] in wood. 80." Thus, it seems clear that the two bindings were acquired, that they were associated with the two Coptic manuscripts taken on approval without payment at the time of the transaction, and that the covers, paid for on the spot but with the option to return them if not satisfied, were thought to be no later than the sixth century, which would also indicate the assumed date of the manuscripts. The wooden bindings indicate that at least one of the Coptic manuscripts was a codex, or part of a codex, although the fact that the bindings could come to be priced and acquired separately indicates they were no longer attached to the manuscript.

On May 26, 1930, Nahman cabled from Cairo to Beatty in London: "Am expecting your kind answer regarding the books please wire your decision I am leaving tenth June." On May 28, 1930, Beatty replied by cable: "Ibscher Berlin only arrived two days ago expect wire you few days."

On May 31, 1930, Beatty cabled again:

> Doctor Ibscher thinks can do nothing with large book [part of the Homilies] also smaller book for which you ask five hundred pounds [second part of the Psalms] will be very difficult. Prepared to give two hundred pounds for smaller manuscript which was the cheaper one otherwise prefer to return same.

If the difference in size is not merely that of thickness, but of height and breadth, then the Psalms, measuring 27 by 17.5 cm, is the smallest (with the possible exception of the Acts, whose no-longer extant book block is of unknown dimensions, but whose eight extant leaves are also small), the others being 31.5 by 18 cm.[1]

On May 31, 1930, Beatty also wrote Nahman a confirming letter:

> With regard to the two manuscripts in question, one of which I have the option to buy from you for £500 and the second for £700, Dr. Ibscher's opinion is that nothing can practically be done with the more expensive one as it was too difficult, but that there was a chance of doing something on the other though from what I could gather he thought the price is very high; therefore, I would not care to exercise either of the options. I would be willing however to pay £200 for the book for which you asked £500 and take the chance of making something out of it.

But on June 2, 1930, Nahman cabled Beatty, who was by then in New York, so that on June 5, 1930, Corble cabled its text to him there:

> Surprised cost too high cannot accept your kind offer Professor Schmidt bought damaged one [Kephalaia] five hundred please keep till my arrival.

1. Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," Manichäische Homilien, 1:xiii. Ibscher's statement that all except the Psalms have the larger dimension would presumably presuppose his having measured the book block of the Acts, though this is not made explicit.

Meanwhile Ibscher had returned to Berlin, taking with him the smaller manuscript [the second part of the Psalms] to conserve, as well as a report about the two manuscripts by Sir Alan H. Gardiner. On June 3, 1930, Ibscher wrote Gardiner (a letter extant only in English translation):

> In the Museum everybody was impatiently waiting for your report about the new discovery. Schubart is so glad that the beautiful papyri have gone to London. As I suspected, Prof. Schmidt has also bought a Coptic book [Kephalaia] from Nahman. I think it is better for everybody that no mystery should be made about it. When Schmidt showed me his purchase and I could see that it was an exactly similar book to the larger one which had been offered to Mr. Chester Beatty, I told him what I had seen in London. Upon this, Schmidt showed his bill for the book, from which I saw that he had paid for his book over £400. But I did not tell anybody about the London prices. As Schmidt is probably the greatest expert on such things, I showed him Mr. Chester Beatty's book [the second part of the Psalms]. He told me at once what it was, and when he called today he said that it was an exceedingly valuable purchase. The language according to him was "Achmimic II." He considers that the book originated from Assiut—at least so I understood. Mr. Beatty's book contained, from what Schmidt could see, songs about the original man. He considers the complete books are the works of the "Manichaeans," in other words, there is no other known example of this work in existence. For this reason alone Schmidt considers that it would be very advisable to buy if possible everything which can be bought. Schmidt considers the book which has been purchased by Mr. Beatty—that is to say, the book I have here—is the most valuable book of the whole lot. I am very pleased for Mr. Beatty that he has made such a lucky purchase. Since I have been told what valuable treasures these books are, I must of course put aside all my considerations and recommend him to complete the purchase.
> I should also like to save the badly preserved books. Of course, Mr. Beatty should try to get a lower price on account of the great expense incurred by the restoration.
> Where Schmidt's purchase will ultimately go, he does not know himself because the local collections and libraries here have no money and he will be forced to resell them very soon because he has purchased them on borrowed money. Perhaps it may be possible for this book also to be bought by Mr. Chester

> Beatty. It is in better preservation than the large book which has been offered to him. Of course, this is only a suggestion of mine. Schmidt would probably be able to dispose of this book in Germany, only in case it should ultimately go to America I think it would be well if it went to its brothers in London.

Gardiner thereupon telephoned Wooderson on June 6, 1930, who passed on to Corble the phone conversation in typed form, which read in part as follows:

> Dr. Alan H. Gardiner (Park 5109) rang up about the COPTIC MANUSCRIPTS for which Mr. Chester Beatty is negotiating with Mr. Maurice Nahman. He has received the MSS. from the little man (? Dr. Ibscher) who was working with the papyri in England, and who has now gone back to Berlin. This man thought at first that it was not desirable to purchase the better of these two manuscripts, but now he writes that, having found out what it is, he certainly does advise the purchase of it, as it is a very valuable MS. . . .
>
> If he could not get it cheaper, he should pay the full price asked, i.e., £500 . . .
>
> Of the series, it is by far the most important manuscript and of greater importance than the one Dr. Schmidt has bought. Dr. Ibscher writes very excitedly about it. The date is well known. It is the upper part of the one Mr. Beatty has already got. It was cut in two and Nahman is selling it as two manuscripts. Mr. Chester Beatty has bought one-half and it is the other half which Dr. Gardiner has in his house and is telephoning about.
>
> The manuscript offered for £700 should be rejected.
> The above is Dr. Gardiner's message verbatim.

In spite of the claim that the written text is the verbatim equivalent of Gardiner's oral report, there seems to be considerable garbling at some stage in the transmission. For Ibscher had all along advocated the purchase of the better of the two manuscripts (in terms of conservation), the one offered at £500 [the second part of the Psalms]. The purchase of this manuscript is considered a fait accompli: Ibscher in his letter called it "Mr. Chester Beatty's book," and referred to it as "the book which has been purchased by Mr. Beatty." The point at which Ibscher has changed his mind in the light of Schmidt's enthusiasm is, in Ibscher's letter, clearly the larger manuscript for which £700 was the asking price and which Ibscher had initially described in London as not conservable and hence had left with Gardiner in London before returning to Berlin (part of the Homilies). The reversal of opinion is in the formulation "Schmidt considers that it would be very advisable to buy if possible everything which can be bought," and in Ibscher's resultant comment, "I should also like to save the badly preserved books."

When Ibscher continues, "Of course, Mr. Beatty should try to get a lower price on account of the great expense incurred by the restoration," this is not only motivated by a concern to protect funds from which his restoration work might be paid, but reflects his recognition that the manuscript Schmidt had purchased for "over £400" "was an exactly similar book to the larger one which had been offered to Mr. Chester Beatty," in that the dimensions of both were 31.5 by 18 cm, so that the price might well be negotiated down from £700 to something "over £400."

The second part of the Psalms had already begun to be conserved, as Schmidt's reference to a manuscript containing "songs about the original man" would indicate. For among the unpublished materials that H. J. Polotsky submitted to Sir Herbert Thompson for distribution to Beatty and Crum, there is (in the Crum Archives in the Griffith Institute of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford) a leaf labeled by Polotsky "C.B.1," containing his Coptic transcription (Crum Mss. 11.30.1) together with another leaf containing his English (!) translation (Crum Mss. 11.28.84 and Crum Mss. 11.28.122). At the top of the transcription is written "Hymns to the Primal Man." The translation begins: "We praise our father, the Primal Man." The psalm is numbered 213. Beside the numeral in the Coptic transcription is the appended note: "(precedes Allberry p. 1)." We apparently have before us here the beginning of both Ibscher's and Polotsky's work for Beatty, as "C.B.1" may suggest.

This identification of the second part of the Psalms as the first thing conserved for Beatty was confirmed in its publication:[2]

When I then succeeded in Berlin in detaching a leaf of the part acquired by Prof. C. Schmidt, he was able to conclude with certainty	Als es mir dann in Berlin gelang, eine Seite des von Herrn Prof. C. Schmidt erworbenen Teiles freizulegen, konnte dieser mit that this discovery had to do with works of Mani. A few weeks later in London I succeeded in detaching a leaf from one of the volumes acquired by Mr. A. Chester Beatty, and the conclusion of Prof. C. Schmidt found a complete confirmation.

2. Ibscher, "Die Handschrift," Manichaean Psalm Book, 2:vii.

If the examination of the manuscript in Berlin showed that one had acquired here a part of the Kephalaia, the first separated leaf of the Chester Beatty possession showed us that here the Psalms of the Mani community lie before us.

Sicherheit feststellen, dass es sich bei dem Funde tatsächlich um Werke des Mani handelte. Wenige Wochen später gelang es mir dann auch in London, von einem der von Mr. A. Chester Beatty erworbenenen Bände ein Blatt abzuheben, und die Feststellung von Herrn Prof. C. Schmidt fand eine volle Bestätigung.

Ergab die Prüfung der Handschrift in Berlin, dass man dort einen Teil der "Kephalaia" erworben hatte, so zeigte uns das erste losgelöste Blatt des Chester Beatty Besitzes, dass hier die Psalmen der Manigemeinde vorlagen.

Hence the discussion was not about whether to acquire the second part of the Psalms, which was already being conserved as Beatty's property, but rather whether to acquire the unconservable larger codex which was in Gardiner's home (part of the Homilies). One might hope to get it for about the same price Schmidt had paid for a similar-sized manuscript. This was especially true since "Professor Schmidt's manuscript is better preserved than the one which is offered to Mr. Beatty," according to Ibscher's letter. This refers to the manuscript offered at £700 that Ibscher had ruled could not be conserved. However, Wooderson misunderstood Ibscher's comment to refer to the smaller and hence cheaper manuscript offered at £500: "Professor Schmidt's manuscript is better preserved than the one which is offered to Mr. Beatty . . . If he could not get it cheaper, he should pay the full price asked, i.e., £500."

This confusion is apparently responsible for the further inaccuracy in Wooderson's report:

> Prof. Schmidt thinks that it comes from Akhmim, and it contains poems about the first man. It is the upper part of the one Mr. Beatty has already got. It was cut in two and Nahman is selling it as two manuscripts. Mr. Chester Beatty has bought one-half and it is the other half which Dr. Gardiner has in his house and is telephoning about.

The grain of truth in this statement about two halves of a codex is that Nahman, or middlemen from whom he acquired the manuscripts, had broken in two the Psalms codex as well as the second codex (the Homilies, see below), no doubt to increase the profit. But Nahman intentionally or unintentionally offered Beatty part of each of two codices on March 23, 1930, and the other part of each of the same two codices in April 1931. The fact that the two offered in 1930 were from different books should have been clear from references to them as different sizes, but this detail seems here overlooked. At the time, one was in Berlin, the other in London, so that the difference in size was not immediately apparent.

The most reasonable assumption is that the manuscript in Gardiner's home is the one offered at £700, which Ibscher initially ruled was not conservable, and hence which he did not take to Berlin to conserve, and which, as a result, Beatty proposed not to buy, but which now Ibscher (and no doubt Gardiner, assuming the situation was clear to him) was recommending should be bought. Wooderson, misunderstanding the situation, would have inferred, based on his misunderstanding, that "the manuscript offered for £700 should be rejected." The whole point of Ibscher's letter (and Gardiner's phone conversation) was apparently just the reverse: to urge the purchase of the larger codex offered at £700, part of the Homilies, for whatever price it would take, but presumably about the amount Schmidt had paid for another manuscript of the same larger format, the Kephalaia, namely somewhat "over £400." This figure suggesting £500 may have in part led to the false identification of the manuscript in question with the one offered at £500.

On June 6, 1930, Corble cabled Beatty what was wrongly taken to be Ibscher's (and Gardiner's?) recommendation—that the smaller manuscript, the second part of the Psalms, be acquired "whatever the price."

> Doctor Gardiner hears from Ibscher that after further study he advises you purchase Coptic manuscript offered by Nahman five hundred pounds. Manuscript bought by Professor Schmidt better preserved but one offered by Nahman of greater importance and they think you should purchase it whatever the price. Schmidt thinks manuscript comes from Akhmim and contains poems about first man.

On June 9, 1930, Beatty cabled Corble ("have answered Nahman direct"), though the decision, much less the price offered, is not recorded, neither is the cable nor hence the price preserved (presumably "over £400"). Nahman cabled Beatty the same day: "Accept your offer for small manuscript many thanks if you are interested in large one will accept same price will be in London end June."

Nahman arrived in London July 9, 1930, and in the coming days settled his accounts with Beatty's staff. A sheet in Nahman's hand reads:

> Mr. Chester Beatty
>
> Two Coptic manuscripts on papyrus.
> Fayoumic language and two wood binding of a Coptic manuscript on approval in London £1200

An appended note reads, in another hand, "One purchased and paid for at £500-0-0." Other scrawled notes coordinating with other acquisitions of that time tend to indicate that Nahman submitted this document in July 1930, and hence that the acquisition of the smaller codex, the second part of the Psalms, was completed then. This would indicate that Beatty had not quibbled further about the price Nahman asked for the smaller codex, but had followed fully what was taken to be Ibscher's advice to "pay the full price asked, i.e., £500" (Ibscher had actually proposed negotiating down the price of the part of the Homilies for which Nahman had asked £700), and that Nahman had hence returned to his original asking price for the second, larger codex (£700), after having in fact come down to £500 in his cable to Beatty of June 9, 1930.

On July 16, 1930, Wooderson handed Nahman a letter from Beatty:

> I understand you wish to leave the damaged Coptic manuscript . . . with me so that I can study them further . . . If you decide to do this Miss Kingsford will give you a receipt for them and will hold them subject to your instructions.

A two-ring binder that seems to have served in the early years as a kind of accessions book at the Chester Beatty Library has a page dated "1930—July," that apparently refers to this manuscript and to one of the wooden covers:

Sent by Nahman, belonging to him.
Papyrus with 1 cover. Safe B.
(Ibscher 1930)
Given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman.

A similar entry is on another page, completely marked through, apparently when its contents were transferred to another filing system:

—Coptic Ms. With 1 cover belonging to Nahman in Box. [Marked out: Study Safe B]
—2 Magical vellum fragments,
10 pages in each (Marked out: BM) belonging to Nahman. Both given to Dr. Ibscher for Nahman, May 10, 1932

The cryptic reference to giving the material to Ibscher for Nahman on May 10, 1932, can be explained by tracing the story from 1930 to 1932 as follows: At about the end of June 1930, Ibscher wrote Gardiner from Turin (a letter conserved only in an undated English translation):

> I hope you received my letter from Berlin, when I wrote to you about the Coptic manuscripts. Schmidt's hope to dispose of his book in Berlin or Germany has become rather doubtful, after the death of Harnack [June 10, 1930], on whose support he counted a lot. The Berlin Library intended to buy the book, and Harnack's decision would have been the determining factor. Has Mr. Chester Beatty bought both books?

On May 19, 1931, Ibscher wrote Beatty from Berlin (with the English translation made at that time):

The Berlin purchases are still in Egypt. Prof. Schmidt has brought with him only one very badly preserved volume which looked quite hopeless [part of the Kephalaia]. Nevertheless I have succeeded in saving some more or less complete pages. I therefore would still advise you to acquire the volume that is still at the British Museum. Certainly one should obtain more from this volume than from the indifferent purchase of Prof. Schmidt.	Die Berliner Ankäufe sind noch in Ägypten, nur einen sehr schlecht erhaltenen Band hat Prof. Schmidt mitgebracht, der hoffnungslos aussah [part of the Kephalaia]. Trotzdem ist es mir gelungen, auch daraus ziemlich vollständige Seiten zu gewinnen. Daher möchte ich doch raten, dass Sie den noch im British Museum befindlichen Band erwerben. Sicher muss daraus noch mehr zu holen sein, wie aus dem schlechten Ankauf von Prof. Schmidt.

Our Berlin volume which we already have here is 30 centimeters in height and 20 centimeters in width. As soon as the other purchases arrive I will let you know their dimensions.

I presume that the dealers have divided the individual books in order to obtain more money. Of course we shall only know the real position when we can compare all the volumes.

Meanwhile I have already been able to separate several pages of your papyri, but I must first arrange here the fibers and place pieces before I can put them under glass.

Unser Berliner Band, den wir bereits hier haben, ist 32 ctm. hoch and 20 ctm. breit. Sowie die übrigen Ankäufe eintreffen, teile ich Ihnen die Grösse mit.

Ich vermute, dass die Händler die einzelnen Bücher geteilt haben, um mehr Geld heraus zu schlagen. Genaues wird man darüber erst sagen können, wenn alle Bände beieinander sind.

In der Zwischenzeit habe ich bereits einige Blätter von Ihrem Papyrus wieder ablösen können, doch muss ich hier erst die Fasern in Ordnung bringen and Stücke ansetzen bevor ich sie verglasen kann.

"The volume which is still at the British Museum" must be the part of the Homilies offered at £700 that had been in the home of Gardiner.

On January 4, 1932, Sir Herbert Thompson wrote Beatty:

> I have a rather urgent letter from Dr. Carl Schmidt in Berlin, asking me to send him some news as to the Mani papyrus, which you had, I believe, on approval, as scholars are very anxious—and not in Germany only—to have some public statement as to these "mysterious" Manichaean manuscripts. But Dr. Schmidt, rightly I think, wishes to defer any such statements till the fate of this outstanding papyrus of the Mani find is settled—either by its passing into your collection—or finding an assured home, perhaps at Copenhagen, or else in Berlin. The important point is that it should be in hands where it would be accessible for study in association with those in your hands and those in the Berlin Museum.
> So I venture again to trouble you with a question as to whether it is still in your custody—and if so, may I be allowed to see it? and also whether you still have any thought of acquiring it, or not? If you do not, Dr. Schmidt tells me that Nahman has given him the first option of purchase; but he fears that if the matter is delayed much longer, Nahman may change his mind, and the opportunity of fixing it in safe hands may be lost.

On January 26, 1932, Wooderson replied on behalf of Beatty to the effect "that the Mani Papyrus is still the property of Mons. Nahman and is being held in safekeeping by Mr. Beatty at Baroda House." Thus, the manuscript must have been moved again, from the British Museum to Beatty's home.

On March 15, 1932, Nahman wrote in his wooden English to Beatty in Cairo concerning it:

> The present is to inform you that I have sold the Coptic manuscript I left towards you in London. When you honoured me of your kind visit you told me that you are not interested in this manuscript neither the magical parchemins [sic] Coptic and I expected two years and with my regret I missed you in London and to-day I think you will not be angry with me if I have found a buyer. Then I beg of you, Dear Sir, to be as so kind to hand to Mr. Ibscher the manuscript and the magical Coptic parchemin [sic].
> Will you be as so kind to send the answer of this letter to me that you agree to hand the manuscript and the magical parchemin [sic] to Mr. Ibscher when he will be in London. Your letter will allow to me to prove to my buyer that the matter is settled.

On March 19, 1932, Schmidt, also in Cairo, wrote on his calling card a note to Beatty regretting that he had to leave the next day for Luxor and hence would not be able to see Beatty in Cairo as he had hoped. At this time in Cairo, he would have liked to have completed the transaction with Nahman.

On March 21, 1932, Beatty replied to Nahman: "I will be pleased to deliver the same to Dr. Ibscher when he comes to London." A handwritten note at the bottom of the letter states: "Taken to Dr. Gardiner's—May 10."

In the initial essay presented by Carl Schmidt and H. J. Polotsky to the Berlin Academy of Sciences, published in 1933, P^{15999} is referred to as "the papyrus book very recently added to the corpus of Berlin Manichaica."[3] Such a designation tends to set this codex off from the others as the most recent acquisition. Wilhelm Schubart recorded in the Inventarbuch of the Papyrus-Sammlung: "Coptic Papyrus Codex. Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt in Cairo 1932. Gift of Dr. W. Kohlhammer." The Inventarbuch had recorded for P^{15995}–P^{15998}:

3. Schmidt and Polotsky, "Ein Mani-Fund," 30.

"Acquired through Prof. Carl Schmidt, in Cairo, 1931. Gift of Mr. August Pfeffer 1933." The disparity in time between the acquisition in 1931 and the gift of the purchase price in 1933 reflects the difficulties Schmidt had finding funding for his initial acquisitions, a procedure that seems to have been quite independent of the acquisition of P^{15999} in 1932 through Kohlhammer's gift. Thus, even though in the cases of P^{15995} through P^{15998} more than a single transaction in Egypt was involved (as many as seven transactions in the case of P^{15996}), the manuscripts shared a common date and a common donor that set them apart from P^{15999}. This would tend to indicate that it was P^{15999} that had been offered unsuccessfully to Beatty and was ultimately acquired by Schmidt for Berlin. The reference in the Inventarbuch to acquisition in Cairo is not contradicted by Ibscher's securing the manuscript in London and taking it directly to Berlin. For Schmidt and Nahman had completed their negotiation in Cairo in March 1932.

Schmidt knew that Ibscher planned to be in London in April 1932 (Ibscher had written to London already on February 19, 1932), and Schmidt would have proposed to Nahman that Ibscher deliver the manuscript to the new owner on Ibscher's return to Berlin. Ibscher's decidedly negative assessment of possibly conserving this manuscript for Beatty is the same as the assessment of the impossibility of conserving P^{15999} that prevailed when the manuscript was in Berlin.

At the time Beatty released his option and thus let Schmidt exercise his option, it was not known that the manuscript was part of the Homilies of which Beatty by then had acquired a second, smaller part (see below), which was being actively conserved in Berlin by Ibscher and edited for Beatty by Polotsky.

Of the initial acquisition of two manuscripts on approval of March 23, 1930, we may hence conclude that one seems to have been acquired in July 1930 (the latter part of the Psalms, Codex A), the other to have been turned down on March 21, 1932, so that Schmidt could buy it for Berlin (part of the Homilies, P^{15999}).

At some time, Beatty also acquired the rest of the Psalms, Codex A; the Synaxeis, Codex B; volume two of the Kephalaia, Codex C; and the smaller part of the Homilies, Codex D. Documentation available is inadequate to identify the actual acquisition of each of these, but some information is available.

In a letter of November 27, 1930, from Beatty to Gardiner, a codex is to be entrusted to Ibscher to take to Berlin for conservation:

> I am sending you the tin box containing the [inserted by hand: Papyri] Coptic Book.
>
> I suggest, before Dr. Ibscher puts it into his bag, that he carefully looks at it to be sure it is satisfactorily packed.
> I hope this book will act in a more gentlemanly manner than the other, and respond to the treatment better.

On November 27, 1930, Ibscher also wrote Beatty a receipt for "the new treasures of your collection . . . handed over to me by Mr. Alan H. Gardiner," with the hope that he can complete the conservation of much of them before his expected return to London in March 1931.

This "new treasures" must refer to an otherwise undocumented acquisition after Ibscher's return to Berlin at the end of the spring of 1930, since at the end of May or the beginning of June Ibscher had already taken to Berlin the part of the Psalms codex acquired March 23, 1930, whereas the part of the Homilies acquired March 23, 1930, was kept on approval in London until Beatty decided on March 21, 1932, not to acquire it and turned it over to Ibscher for Schmidt on May 10, 1932.

On December 30, 1930, Beatty had £300 cabled to Nahman, no doubt the payment of a bill. A memo to Nahman while in London of July 16, 1930, confirmed a telephone conversation listing acquisitions ("the Greek Papyri and the bindings") with the stipulation that "the balance of £600 [be paid] on or before the 1st January, 1931." Thus the payment of £300 cannot be associated convincingly with a Manichaean purchase.

Another leaf in the two-ring binder that served as a kind of acquisitions notebook records:

> 1931. April. Cairo.
>
> —Manichaean Hymns (box: 15 1/4 x 10 1/4 in.)
> Ibscher.
>
> —Manichaean Ritual (box 14 5/8 x 9 1/2 in.)
>
> Laws Ibscher.
>
> —3 Wooden covers [Marked out: "Safe B." Added: "IX"]

The page with the marked-out entries reads similarly:

Brought by Mr. Beatty April 1931.
—Manichaean Ms. Hymns
[Added note: With Dr. Ibscher May 8/31] PSALMS. Codex A.
—Manichaean Ms. Ritual Laws
—3 Covers [Marked out: Safe B.] Cup X.c

A handwritten note on a large paper envelope in which three wooden boards are presently stored at the Chester Beatty Library states: "purchased Spring 1931." This confirms that the reference "Brought by Mr. Beatty April 1931" is the date of this acquisition.

What is underlined in addition to a characterization of the contents is no doubt the reference to where the material was currently deposited. The words "Safe B" are marked through, and "IX" added, no doubt when the covers were removed from the safe. The "Manichaean Hymns" are no doubt the other part of Codex A, the Psalms, completing the acquisition of this codex, of which only a part had been acquired in 1930. But the identification of the manuscript referred to with the terms Ritual and Laws is less clear, as is the identify of another possible acquisition late in 1930 suggested by the following:

On May 19, 1931, Ibscher wrote Beatty from Berlin:

> According to your wish I have photographed your papyri, and I am sending you proofs thereof.
>
> Should you wish to have more proofs, I will gladly have several more made.
> Besides these three books I have another thinner one which certainly belongs to the smaller book. Should you wish to have the photograph of that I will also have it done. I have already taken a few leaves from the books which are already under glass.

It is unclear what the reference to three books in Berlin belonging to Beatty envisages. If the "smaller" book means the Psalms, the only codex with smaller dimensions, then what is referred to as "another thinner one" that "belongs to" that codex would be the part of the Psalms acquired in April 1931. Then the "three books" would be the Psalms, part of which was taken to Berlin in May and June of 1930 and the rest after its acquisition April 1931; the unidentified codex taken to Berlin November 27, 1930; and the part of the Homilies acquired in April 31 and taken to Berlin shortly thereafter.

On June 11, 1931, Thompson met with Schmidt, and on June 15, 1931, wrote to Beatty:

> He [Schmidt] has been recently in Egypt, making inquiries about the find, and he is satisfied that the whole find was divided into 8 parts, between 3 dealers, of which I understand 5 are coming to Berlin, and he declared you had two Mss. and one on approval, viz. your Hymn book, now in Ibscher's hands and another (?). Is this so? and if so, would you let me see it—and also the papyrus on approval? I should very much like to get some idea of its (their?) size and contents, if possible.

On January 4, 1932, Thompson again wrote Beatty inquiring whether Beatty still had in his custody the manuscript on which he had an option, and, if so, whether Thompson could see it. Apparently, Beatty did not respond to this part of either letter. In the same way that Beatty's unresponsiveness to Thompson is unintelligible, Thompson's identification of Schmidt's material is unclear. The two manuscripts Thompson writes about could be the two parts of the Psalms, counted as one or as two, and the part of the Homilies acquired in April 1931, without reference to the unidentified codex taken to Berlin on December 27, 1930; or it could be counted, but the part of the Homilies not counted as a separate book.

Ibscher's translation of a report of February 19, 1932, concerning the state of his conservation gives evidence that by then, Beatty had acquired the three and a half codices that were ultimately to be his part of the Manichaean discovery, in addition to the part of a codex that he held but finally did not acquire:

> Now as regards your question, how many leaves are still [to] be expected. From my Report herewith (draft of proposed paper for the Berlin Academy) on the Mani-books, you will see how many leaves I have been able to reckon on in the Berlin Kephalaia-book (viz. 498 pages—c. 250 leaves), and I expect that all the volumes were of approximately the same size. If we assume that the Hymnbook [Codex A, the Psalms] was so, as would appear from its external appearance, there should result from it a further 150–200 leaves. The other two volumes [Codex B, the Synaxeis; Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia], which Mr. Beatty has purchased, may contain as much. If therefore fortune favours me, I may hope to get 450–600 leaves from the entire property of Mr. Chester Beatty, of which about 100 are already separated. The Homilies [the > part of the codex that Ibscher had left in London in 1930 as not conservable] are not included in this calculation (?). It was a hopeless-looking mass which lay beside the Hymn-book. At first I did not think that anything could be done with it—and yet you see what important things have come out of it. I am proposing now first to finish up the 37 leaves which constitute it, as that will exhaust it. These leaves do not belong to any of the others here—nor I expect to the volume which is still in Mr. Beatty's possession [actually they do belong to the same codex: the Homilies]. Perhaps I shall be able to establish this point, when I come to London in April and we may perhaps be able to see the volume together. I shall certainly bring over a number of the completed Homily leaves. I think you will also agree that I had better finish up this portion of the collection first; and the next work will be to complete the Hymnbook, at the same time working on the two other books, from which it may be that more important results will come.

The comment that the Homilies "lay beside the Hymn-book" would tend to identify the second manuscript acquired in April 1931 ("Manichaean Ritual Laws") as the Homilies. This would mean that in March 1930 and in April 1931 Nahman offered Beatty parts of the same two codices—the Psalms and the Homilies. The reason for Beatty's not acquiring the part offered in 1930 was no doubt Ibscher's initial opinion that it could not be conserved, and Ibscher's failure to communicate his subsequent willingness to attempt it. This is much the same reaction as that reported concerning the part acquired in 1931: "a hopeless-looking mass . . . At first I did not think that anything could be done with it—and yet you see what important things have come out of it." This would hence be an added confirmation that one has to do in both cases with the same hopeless-looking codex. On March 21, 1932, Beatty released his option on the second manuscript of 1930; he no doubt did not yet realize that it completed a manuscript he had bought in 1931. For Ibscher was not yet aware of it on February 19, 1932, but hoped to investigate the question when in London in April that year. By this time Beatty had released his option, and Schmidt had closed his deal with Nahman.

Ibscher's reference to "the two other volumes, which Mr. Beatty has purchased," would seem to envisage complete codices, since they are assumed to be the same size as the Kephalaia, yielding some 150–200 leaves. They would then be Codex B, the Synaxeis, and Codex C, volume two of the Kephalaia. The details of their acquisition are not known, beyond the reference to one being taken by Ibscher to Berlin in the autumn of 1930.

A document entitled "Notes of Conference Mr. A. C. B. had with Dr. Alan Gardiner on Sunday, 8th May, 1932" (in which, according to a letter of May 10, 1932, from Beatty to Thompson, Ibscher was also involved), confirms the identity of the manuscript not acquired by Beatty with the Berlin manuscript P^{15999}, in the context of an imprecise overview of all the holdings (no doubt a garbled version of Ibscher's view reported more accurately in his letter of February 19, 1932, quoted above):

> It seems that Berlin has four manuscripts; one is the epistles [P^{15998}], one seems to be about the life of Mani [P^{15997}], one seems to be of the principles of the Mani religion [P^{15996}]—this latter manuscript consists of two parts which were bought separately, and really represents one book of about 500 leaves [read: pages]. The other two are of about 200 leaves each. [P^{15995} involves only thirty-one leaves; there is no further Berlin codex, other than P^{15999} treated below. A handwritten note in the margin reads: "This makes five in all."]
> Schmidt has recently bought, I assume through Berlin, another manuscript [P^{15999}] from Nahman which was the one stored with Mr. A. B. C.
>
> The Manichean manuscripts owned by Mr. A. C. B. consist of four: one is in the form of homilies of about 200 pages; one seems to be an epistle of 200 pages; one is a book of travels and journeys of about 500 [above the figure is written by hand: 50] pages, and one which was in two parts of about 400 pages [added in hand: "? in the form of hymns;" hence Codex A, the Psalms].

Søren Giversen quoted the third paragraph above about Beatty's acquisitions and interpreted it as follows:

> The book of travels and journeys is apparently identical to the Homilies, later published by Polotsky, and in a letter of 12 May 1932 Alan H. Gardiner speaks of "the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani" which Polotsky was going to publish. In a formal letter of 13 May 1932 A. Chester Beatty writes: "I am to cede to Dr. Polotsky publication rights in the 50 leaves relating to the journeyings of Mani provided he produces his work within a reasonable time."[4]
